There has been dug up and brought into this case, to sustain the view of the contestant that this poll should be thrown out, a single case occurring in the assembly of my own State in 1871. I forget at this moment the contestant's name. The case is found in New York contested-election cases, and part of it is quoted in the minority report. It was a case where a man of the name of Terhune, appointed a supervisor of elections, interfered with the count in regard to the office of member of assembly. As supervisor of elections he had no business to count a single ballot except the ballots for member of Congress; but going beyond his duty, taking no part in the count for Congress or any other part of the count, he simply interfered with the count for member of assembly.

In our State the assembly ballots are on separate tickets from the Congressional and State tickets, and there is a separate box for each. He paid his entire attention to the assembly count. It appeared that he was a violent partisan and friend of one of the gentlemen, a Republican, running for member of assembly. It appeared that that gentleman received a majority of some twenty-odd in the district which elected him to the assembly, while the Democratic candidate for governor received a majority of 24 votes in the same election district, and this was not accounted for. It appeared further that by the heading on these assembly tickets they were easily discernible, and a man could separate them if he wanted to commit a fraud, and pick out the tickets by their appearance.

These last two facts seem to have escaped the attention of the minority of the committee in their report. All that appeared in the case. And what more? Terhune was called on to explain on two different occasions, but failed to appear, and failed to make any explanation. Then, by a partisan vote in the committee, and by a partisan vote in the assembly, the assembly being very close, and they needing that vote very much to maintain their majority, this precinct was thrown out, the election was reversed, and the contestant was admitted to the seat. That is entirely different from the case here. In that case it appeared that Terhune might have manipulated the ballots; might have substituted other ballots; might have committed a fraud on the ballot-box. In this case it appeared that Bell took the tickets from the ballot-box and laid them on the table, and they were counted by the judges and returned by the judges and clerks of election. I do not think the House will throw out 166 majority, will disfranchise three hundred and odd voters in any precinct on any such pretext as this, even if the New York assembly in 1871 did declare a different doctrine on a different state of facts.

How much more time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes remaining, if ten are reserved for the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY].

Mr. DORSEY. If the gentleman from New York wants my ten minutes he can have them.

Mr. PAYNE. Now in regard to this Precinct B in the eighth ward I want to state another fact. I see it stated somewhere in the report of the minority that the year before, in the year 1883, this precinct gave a majority for the Democratic candidate for governor. Who is there in this House who does not know that the majority for Governor Hoadley in 1883 in Ohio, in every city in Ohio, and especially in every German precinct in every city in Ohio, was phenomenally large and did not represent the true Democratic majority in those precincts? On the other hand, the sitting member here is a German. The voters of the precinct were nearly all Germans.

The evidence in the case is that three times before this, when Mr. Romeis had been a candidate in the city of Toledo for the office of mayor, he had carried this Precinct B of the eighth ward by a "big majority," as a witness puts it, every time. He was a popular man in Precinct B of the eighth ward. Mr. Warnke, the witness whom Gerst-mann says he met and received these admissions from, not only contradicts what Gerstmann says, but says from the time of the nomination Precinct B of the eighth ward was almost unanimously for Romeis. He was their man. There was no change from beginning to end of the canvass. And when the ballots were opened and counted they declared the true purpose of the electors of Precinct B of the eighth ward, and that was to vote for Romeis; he was a popular man in the precinct.

It is not a surprising result, the defeat of Mr. Hurd in the tenth Congressional district of the State of Ohio. True, it is a Democratic district. True, it has been accustomed to give 2,500 or 3,000 Democratic majority. But he has been returned from that district some six or seven times. It is not phenomenal, not wonderful, not out of the ordinary course of events that when a man comes from a district time after time he will eventually lose some of his popularity and standing in his party. The evidence shows there were many disgruntled Democrats in the city of Toledo and in the tenth district, many who opposed openly the candidacy of Frank H. Hurd and worked and voted against him at the election.

Why, Mr. Speaker, in 1882 this tendency of Mr. Hurd to run behind his ticket began to manifest itself in the tenth district of Ohio. In 1882 Newman was the Democratic candidate for secretary of state, and his majority was 3,660. Hurd was a candidate against a man named King—a man not rejoicing in a German name or having any special popularity in a German district—and Mr. Hurd's majority was 2,556 less than that of Newman, being only 1,104. In 1884 Newman's majority in the same district was 2,706, and Romeis's majority 239; a difference between Newman and Hurd of 2,945. So that Mr. Hurd did not lose votes as fast in the two years between 1882 and 1884 as he had been losing them previously in the campaigns of 1878, 1880, and down to 1882.

It was not a surprising result; it was not an unexpected result; it was the natural result; it was just such a result as you would expect from the evidence in this case, which shows no intimidation, no dishonesty, no fraud, no corruption, no dishonest use of money in any precinct—which shows that the only evidence that some one even said money was to be used comes from a man of the name of Gerstmann, a witness who has impeached himself so thoroughly in his cross-examination that I have heard no man claim, in the committee or on this floor, that he was to be believed, except on the pretext that he was a Republican agent, and that what he said after his agency had ceased was to be taken against the Republican party not only, but against one of the servants of the Republican party, Mr. Jacob Romeis, the sitting member in this case.

Mr. Speaker, as I said in the beginning, this is a case to be decided on the law and on the facts. It is an occasion for us to rise to the dignity of the question at issue, to the dignity conferred on us by the Constitution of the United States, which makes us the judges of the election of our members. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DORSEY was recognized, and said: I reserve my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, Frank H. Hurd denies and contests the right of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Romeis] to represent the tenth Congressional district of that State upon the floor of this House. The grounds of this contest were made known in due time to the contestee; all the testimony deemed necessary by either party has been taken, and elaborate argument on behalf of each has been listened to by your Committee on Elections; and after careful examination into the merits of the matter I am not able to give my assent to the recommendation of the committee that Mr. Hurd should be denied his seat in this House. It is right and proper, in fact the duty which I owe to the contestant and to myself, that I should make known the reasons which have controlled my judgment in reaching the conclusion that Mr. Romeis was not elected, and that Mr. Hurd was (upon a fair and lawful count of the ballots) duly elected to represent the tenth Ohio district as a member of this Congress. And as one of the number dissenting from the report of your committee, I avail myself of this opportunity for so doing.

It will be proper, in the outset, to state the grounds upon which Mr. Hurd has contested the apparent election of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Romeis], so that we, as Representatives of the American people, and made the sole judges of the election, may know whether or not the causes assigned (if proven to be true) are sufficient to unseat Mr. Romeis, and, in his stead, to seat Mr. Hurd.

The grounds of this contest are set forth with great distinctness by the contestant, and one and all of them are of the gravest nature, involving bribery, intimidation, irregularities, and uncertainties in holding the election and counting the votes, a tampering with the poll-list, and, perhaps, ballot stuffing.

To economize time I will take them up in the following order:

First. It was certified by the judges of election at Precinct B, ward 8, of the city of Toledo, that 325 votes had been cast at the last Congressional election for Mr. Romeis and 105 votes for Mr. Hurd—giving Mr. Romeis a majority of 220 votes at that polling place. It is not claimed by either of the parties to the contest that that certificate is true, but it is admitted by both parties to be untrue!

This House has the power, unquestionably, to reject the entire poll of votes at that precinct; but the power to do so is of such a character that it should be exercised only in an extreme case. But if the evidence should convince us that the one we are dealing with is an extreme case—one in which it is impossible to ascertain with reasonable certainty the true vote; one in which the conduct of the election officers has been such as to destroy the integrity of their returns; and to avoid the prima facie made thereby, it is our duty not to hesitate about rejecting the poll; for it is unquestionably one of the highest duties of this House to protect and secure the purity of the election of its members.

McCrary, at section 303, first edition, lays down the doctrine that—

The power to reject an entire poll is a dangerous power, and, although it belongs to the tribunal having jurisdiction to pass upon the merits of a contested election, it should be exercised only in an extreme case; that is to say, a case where it is impossible to ascertain with reasonable certainty the true vote. It must appear that the conduct of the election officers has been such as to destroy the integrity of their returns and to avoid the prima facie which they ought to bear as evidence before they can be set aside and other proof demanded of the true state of the vote.

The object and end of this investigation is not to give the tenth Ohio district, as its Representative, a man whom the people rejected; but it is one of the highest duties we owe to, or could discharge for, a free people to put in his seat that man who was fairly elected, in spite of the fraud and misconduct, the bribery and intimidation practiced by bad and corrupt men to defeat the popular will. It is the solemn conviction of the minority that the entire poll at that precinct, for reasons cogent, controlling, and imperative, should be rejected. Any other course of dealing with the bribery, irregularity, and uncertainty existing at that box would do violence to their honest convictions.

Let some of the reasons which influenced the judgment of the minority be briefly stated and submitted for your consideration:

As in all other cases, where documents or records establish them prima facie, the return may be assailed either because (1) it is false; (2) or fraudulent; (3) uncertain.

The returns from Precinct B, ward 8, of the city of Toledo are false. The judges of the election, who had solemnly sworn to make true return of the vote cast, deliberately signed a statement which they knew to be false. What has Louis Jahn, one of the judges, to say about this matter? In answer to the question: "State what was first done with reference to the ballots," he replied:

We opened the ballot-box and took the tickets out and put them on the table, all of them; the other two judges counted them; they counted them over twice, and always had more tickets than names on the poll-book; once they had 6 or 7, next time about the same; never could get it even with poll-book; tickets never did correspond with the tally-sheet.

And when asked, what "did the clerks do themselves to make their tally-sheets agree," he replied:

The clerks figured out the votes all ready, and the tally-sheets did not agree with the poll-books.

Again he was asked:

12. After the vote had been figured by the clerks, what did they do with reference to make an agreement between the tally-sheets and the poll-book?
(Objected to by Mr. Romeis's counsel as being irrelevant.)
A. They figured it up between themselves and tried the best they could to make it agree; the clerks did it among themselves.
13. After this, state what you and the judges did to make the vote and tally agree.
A. I moved that they should give every Democratic candidate 2 votes and every Republican candidate 2 votes. They done it, and still they had more tickets left.
14. Did you count any tickets for the votes you added for the Republican and Democratic candidates?
A. Yes, sir.
15. How many tickets were left in the box when you finished the counting?
A. I guess it was about 7.
16. State whether the returns as signed by the judges contain a true statement of the votes as cast at that election.
(Objected to by Mr. Romeis's attorney as being irrelevant.)
A. To tell the truth, I do not think none of us could tell what was the true vote cast.
(Objected to by Mr. Romeis's attorney as being irrelevant.)
17. State whether the return as made states the result at that precinct.
(Objected to by Mr. Romeis's attorney on the ground of immateriality.)
A. It is not the true poll; the tally-sheet was changed twice.
18. How long were you engaged in discussing the matter before you signed up the returns?
(Objected to as immaterial by Mr. Romeis's attorney.)
A. Over two hours. It was after 1 o'clock.
19. What was the occasion of so long a delay?
(Objected to by Mr. Romeis's attorney as being immaterial.)
A. Judge Kelley counted the votes over, and still did not agree. Judge Kelley wanted me to count them over. I said it was not necessary, as they had counted them over two or three times. But I said, you have counted them over twice; and I said I would not count, and I did not count them at all.

Mr. Jahn, in cross-examination, on pages 72, 73, said:

121. I'll ask you whether you did not, as a judge at the October election, certify, among other things, that Jacob Romeis had received a certain number of votes and Frank H. Hurd had received a certain number of votes at that poll on that day?
A. Well, of us judges there was none of us who could tell what was the correct vote that was cast.

This man was a Republican, but was examined on behalf of Mr. Hurd. Upon his cross-examination (page 73 of record) the following were among the questions asked and answers returned by this witness:

125. Did you sign your name to anything after the count was made?
A. Yes, sir; I did.
126. What did you sign?
A. The tally-sheet and the poll-book.
127. The poll-book had a certificate to it in words as follows: "It is hereby certified that the number of electors who voted at this election is 430," did it not?

A. I could not tell how many votes was polled; it was over 400.
128. The certificate did contain the correct number, did it not?
A. No, sir; I think not.
129. Then you certified to a lie, did you not?
A. Well, could say none of us know how the vote stood; we done the best we could to make it agree the two tally-sheets alike.
130. Then you certified to what you knew to be false, did you?
A. No, sir.
131. You say that the certificate is false, do you not?
A. Yes, sir.
132. And you certified to it knowing it to be false, did you not?
A. No, sir; we didn't expect any fault about signing the tally-sheet so long as nobody found any fault. We thought it was all right as long as nobody says anything about it.
133. You knew that the certificate was false to the poll-book when you signed it, did you not?
A. Yes, sir.
134. Then you signed it, knowing it was false, didn't you?
A. Yes, sir.
135. You had before that taken an oath to make a true return of that election, had you not?
A. Yes, sir.
136. And notwithstanding that oath you consented to make a false return, didn't you?
A. No, sir.
137. Now, sir, what was there about the poll-book certificate that was false?
A. They did't agree together.
138. What did not agree together?
A. The tally-sheet with the poll-book and the tickets; we always had more tickets than names on poll-book.

Of the falseness of the returns there can be no doubt; it is undisputed. But the contestee, by his counsel, maintained that the Committee on Elections could correct the returns by simply dropping (from the number of votes returned for each) the two extra or non-existent votes which were added just to make things agree. The proposition had the rare merit of modesty, for, to express it in other language, it amounted to this, namely: Believe so much of this false return as will inure to my benefit (contestee's), and condone the crime of those who acted so falsely and basely in this matter. It is a maxim of the law, and one resting upon a solid foundation, falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus—false in one respect, false throughout.

Upon this point I need say no more. I come now to the great uncertainty in reference to the number of votes which were cast in that precinct.

To properly present this view of the subject I must read the following sections of the Ohio election law.

The laws of Ohio, which bear on the present contest, as taken from Ohio statutes, are as follows:

2956. At the close of the polls the poll-book shall be signed by the judges and attested by clerks, and the names therein contained shall be counted and the numbers set down at the foot of the poll-books in the manner hereinafter provided in the form of the poll-books.
2957. After the poll-books are signed, in the manner hereinafter provided, the ballot-boxes shall be opened, and the ballots therein contained shall be taken out, one at a time, by one of the judges, who shall read aloud distinctly, while the ticket remains in hand, the name or names thereon contained, and then deliver it to the second judge, who shall examine the same and pass it to the third judge, who shall string it on a thread and carefully preserve it, and the same method shall be observed in respect to each of the tickets taken out of the ballot-box until the number taken out of the ballot-box is equal to the number of names in the poll-books; and any ballots in the box in excess of the number of names on the poll-books, together with the ballots strung as aforesaid, shall be deposited in the box and locked, and the box and contents delivered to the officer authorized to receive and keep the key or keys, and the box shall remain locked until the expiration of the time within which any legal notice of contest can be given, and if such notice be given shall remain locked until the trial of such contest.
2958. The clerks shall enter, in separate columns, under the names of persons voted for, as hereinafter provided, in the form of the poll-books, all the votes so as aforesaid read by the judges.
3959. After the examination of ballots has been completed the number of votes for each person shall be enumerated, under the inspection of the judges, and set down, as hereinafter provided, in the form of the poll-books, and be publicly proclaimed to the people present.

Now the evidence is that the poll-lists were not signed by the judges and attested by the clerks at the close of the polls, and the names contained therein counted, and the numbers set down at the foot of the poll-books. Nor were the boxes opened and the ballots taken out one at a time, counted and strung, as required by law; but instead they were emptied upon the table, and the judges (except Jahn) counted them; in fact, counted them over twice, and each time had more tickets than there were names on the poll-book—once about six or seven, next time the same number, and never an even number with the poll-book; the tickets never corresponded with the tally-sheet. When asked, "What then did you do with the tickets?" he answered: "We put them all in the box, what was left." Such is Jahn's testimony. Let us now hear from James Kelley, who was also one of the judges at that precinct:

9. Q. What was first done with the ballots?
A. They were taken out by handfuls and left on the table; then we counted them. The other judge and I counted them to see if they would come out right with the names on the poll-sheets, and we were seven over; we counted them again and we were three over; then we decided for to tally them out, and we took the straights and scratched tickets and put them in separate piles.
11. Q. When you finished, state whether the tally-sheets of the clerks agreed.
(Question objected to by attorney for contestee on the ground of irrelevance and calling for the contents of a written paper.)
A. No; they did not agree.
12. Q. What did the clerks do to make them agree?
A. They fixed them up some way; between them they got them alike.
13. Q. When the count was finished, how did the count compare with the number of votes cast?
(Question objected to on the ground of irrelevancy by contestee's attorney.)
A. Well, they were short two names on the whole sheet than there was names on the poll-book.
14. Q. State what the judges did to make the count and the number of votes agree.
A. Well, I proposed to count them over, and the other judges said for to add one, to give each candidate 2 votes each, to make it come even with the poll-book.
15. Q. State whether that was done.
(Question objected, on the ground that the question was leading, by contestee's attorney.)
A. Yes, sir.
16. Q. State whether or not there were any tickets counted for these 2 votes.
A. No; we did not have no tickets.
17. Q. State whether or not the returns as made up by the officers of election stated truly the result of the election in that precinct.
A. Well, that I could not say; the way it was mixed up we could not say which way it was.
18. Q. State from what you know whether or not there was any certainty in the vote as ascertained and counted that day.
(Objected to as irrelevant, and as calling for witness's opinion as to official action by contestee's attorney.)
A. No; I couldn't give no certainty of it.

As further evidence upon this point I read from the testimony of Charles F. C. Hahn, who was one of the clerks of the election. He was asked:

1140. When the tickets had all been counted and tallied, how did the number so counted and tallied correspond with the number of names on the poll-book?
A. There were four tickets short.
1141. At what time in the count was the discovery first made that the tickets were less in number than the names on the poll-book?
A. I think it was when the votes were counted.
1142. What, if anything, was done to determine whether the tallies equaled the number of tickets, after the deficiency was discovered?
A. The tickets were all counted over without being taken off from the string.
1144. At that time were there any tickets remaining uncounted.
A. No, sir.
1145. What, if anything, was done to make the tally-sheet harmonize with the poll-book?
A. We gave each candidate on both tickets two votes.
1146. What effect had that on the tally-sheets and poll-books?
A. It made them come out even.

I have read only so much of the testimony of these witnesses as is necessary to establish this fact—so forcibly stated by the witness Jahn—that there was "no certainty of it." When the count began there were 7 votes in excess; when it closed there were 4 votes short of the number shown by the poll-book. What became of these votes; how came about the excess; by what sleight of hand did they disappear? Jahn has answered this question for us. 9. "What then did you do with the tickets?—A. We put them all in the box, what was left." Who can trust such men; and what return could they make which this House could, would, or should respect? In addition to certifying to what they knew to be false, and to the violation of the law of the State in every essential particular, we must not forget that the deficit did not occur during the two first countings of the ballots, and not until they had been put back in the box and tallied out. (Hahn's testimony, question 1141.)

There is still another circumstance we can not overlook. There were not so many as 450 votes cast at that precinct, and although the polls were closed at 6 o'clock p. m. on election day, the count was not completed until 1 o'clock a. m. the next day—just seven hours afterward. It is said that the provisions of law which were violated were, each and all of them, merely directory, and not in any manner mandatory. The distinction between such provisions is well known and recognized. But it is only when the purpose of the law has been fulfilled—when, notwithstanding the violation of directory provisions, an honest and fair election has been secured—that this distinction is of any force or virtue. Who will contend that, when directory provisions have been violated in order to secure a false and fraudulent return, they amount to nothing, and should not enter into our consideration or influence our conclusions? Under such circumstances they become potent factors in enabling us to perceive what is right, and they stimulate us to do it, namely, to reject this entire poll.

In the discussion of this matter before the Committee on Elections it was said "the general rule is that the ordinary rules of evidence apply as well to election contests as to other cases. The evidence must therefore be legal evidence, be confined to the point in issue, and must be relevant." Good law, certainly, to govern our examination of the evidence. The evidence in this case may be, and is no doubt hearsay upon several points, but it is none the less admissible; it is part of the res gestæ as to that portion of it upon which we rely. "The res gestæ may properly be defined as consisting of those circumstances which are the undesigned incidents of a particular litigated act, and which are admissible when illustrative of such act." (Wharton on Evidence, section 259.) As an illustration, I read the following from the record, taken from the testimony of the witness Mr. Gerstmann:

Q. From the conversations that you had in the precincts with the residents and voters there, what did you find to be the occasion of the change?
(Question objected to on the part of the contestee as incompetent.)
A. From the conversations that I had with those people and from the change of feelings and their countenances, I could see, I supposed, that their desires had been satisfied or something in that way. Of course they did not come expressly out, but from that I could infer that something was done to poison their minds or to poison their ideas, and that can only be done with money, I suppose; that is according to my ideas, but I was not there, and I had nothing to do with the funds.

He was testifying in relation to the condition of things in Precinct B, ward 8, of the city of Toledo.

"Incidents that are thus immediately and unconsciously associated with an act, whether such incidents are doings or declarations, become in this way evidence of the character of the act" (Wharton on Evidence, section 259), and in this case are overwhelmingly convincing, in view of the result of the election at that precinct. The witness had already testified as follows:

Q. When you went there what did you ascertain as the sentiment of the people resident there with reference to the Congressional candidate?
(Question objected to on the part of the contestee.)
A. Well, I heard that Frank H. Hurd stood a pretty good chance; it was all Frank H. Hurd; that is all I know.
Q. State what, if any, suggestions were made by which this sentiment for Frank H. Hurd could be changed.
A. Well, it could be changed by dealing out a good many kegs of lager-beer, and that would cost money, I suppose, by keeping on the good side of good fellows; you gentlemen understand more about election business than I do. I was not sent there as a distributor; nothing was intrusted to me, and so far as that was concerned I had merely to take a view and report. I presume you understand exactly what I am saying.
Q. What amounts, if any, were specified in any of the conversations that you had with residents of that ward as necessary to make this change?
(Question objected to as immaterial and incompetent.)
A. Well, some had a pretty big amount, and some came down a little lower. To approximate it, they said that two or three thousand dollars would change the whole thing, but if they had any for that purpose I don't know.
Q. State whether or not you reported this information to any of the persons who had directed you to go there.
A. I did; I reported it to headquarters.
Q. What headquarters?
A. State and national; that was all of my business.
Q. What report did you make to the national headquarters?
(The attorney for the contestee desires to ask the witness whether that report is in writing.)
The WITNESS. I believe I reported both verbally and in writing. I am pretty sure of that.
(Question objected to on the part of the contestee, because it appears that the report is in writing.)
A. I reported that it would require financial aid. I did not go into details in what way it would require it. I presume they understood it at headquarters what for.
Q. What did the representatives of the national committee say to you as to whether this fund should be supplied or not?
(Question objected to as incompetent and immaterial.)
A. They said to me that they could not give me individually anything to distribute, that it would be a bad precedent; that every individual would ask as an individual, but that it would come forward through some other channel—that it would go to the committees. That was not given to me in writing at all; that was given to me verbally when I visited New York, and had the conversation with Mr. Elkins, who sent me out.
Q. State what, if anything, was said as to the importance or necessity of sending money to that district.
A. They said that it was a nationally important question; that you were a free-trader, and that it was necessary that you should be defeated. That was in conversation; that was all. They said that if a precedent could be established that moneys could be given to me individually and to others, that they would furnish it, but they could not deviate; that they did not have it exactly to deviate. That was about ten minutes' conversation, and that is the last I have seen of the gentleman.
Q. What, if anything, was said as to the persons to whom the money should be sent in order that it should go to this district?
A. That it would go through the regular channels; that it would go through the committee.
Q. Through the State committee?
A. I suppose so. I know I was told by Mr. Elkins, "You go ahead and tell the chairmen of the State committee to do all they can."

But it will be urged that the uncertainty and falsity of the count and of the returns may be easily cured by rejecting the 2 votes each which were given to the candidates and suffering the result to stand. No! there was such falsity and uncertainty about the returns from that box that the extreme case provided for by law is presented, and the whole poll must be rejected.

But I have not done with the vote cast at Precinct B, ward 8 of the city of Toledo. There is, in my judgment, evidence of the most satisfactory character going to show that bribery was resorted to for the purpose of carrying that precinct for Mr. Romeis. Let us consider the nature and character of that crime. It may be, very properly, assimilated to adultery in many respects; for the briber and the bribe-taker, like the adulterer and the adulteress, are both infamous. It requires but two to commit the crime, and when committed both are equally anxious to forever conceal it from human eyes. Hence it is that the evidence we are compelled to rely upon in almost every instance is not of that positive character so easily attainable in other violations of law—it is circumstantial in its character, but oftentimes overwhelmingly convincing. Now, what are the facts in this instance? The witness Gerstmann tells you that he went under the supervision of the national Republican committee to this precinct; that he had been "appointed by the Republican national committee just to go through Ohio and see how things looked there." Again he was asked:

Q. When you came to Toledo to whom did you report?
A. To the chairman of the central Republican committee.
Q. What was his name?
A. First I believe it was Captain Schenck, after which I was introduced to Captain Brown, who was then chairman.
Q. To what work were you especially assigned by these gentlemen while you were there?
(Question objected to, because it seems that witness was assigned to work by the committee.)
A. Well, I was assigned to the German and Polish element, to see how the matter stands there, because being acquainted with the language, I was to find out their ideas—how they stood.

The result of this work was told by him when he stated that the sentiment in favor of Hurd could be changed by dealing out kegs of lager and the use of $2,000 or $3,000. I need not further repeat what has been set forth in a former part of my remarks; he returned to find that the desires of the voters of that precinct "had been satisfied." The work had been done, and this "nationally important question" had been settled by the defeat of Mr. Hurd. The witness was so impressed by all he gleaned from Ferdinand Warnke and others that he stated, "Had it not been for the use of money and other considerations used in the political machinery Hurd would certainly have carried the precinct." Such is the testimony of this duly authorized agent of the Republican party, and the fruit of his work lies rotten-ripe before us.

I shall now maintain that Mr. Romeis is responsible and must suffer for the acts and doings of his party friends and managers. They were his agents, and whether this bribery was done with or without his knowledge and direction he can not escape, much less can he justly claim the fruits; it renders the election void. In the case of Donnelly vs. Washburn, third district Minnesota, Forty-sixth Congress, the committee said:

It is a clearly established principle of law, both in England and the United States, that bribery committed by the sitting member, or by any agent of the sitting member, with or without the knowledge or direction of the principal, renders the election void.
In England bribery is an offense of so heinous a character and so utterly subversive of the freedom of elections that when proved to have been committed, though in one instance only, and though a majority of unbribed voters remain, the election will be absolutely void. (Cushing's Parliamentary Law, page 70, section 189; Douglass, 11, 389; Maine on Elections, 345; 2 O. M., Hardcastle, 41; 1 O. M., Hardcastle, 50, 203, 236, 119, 37; Rogers on Elections, 417.)

Mr. Romeis can not complain that we hold him responsible for the acts of Mr. Gerstmann. In Rogers's Law and Practice of Elections, pp. 221, 222, we find the following:

The principles of agency derived from the transactions of private life can not be applied with strictness in cases of electioneering agency. In elections where the protection of the public interest is the object to be attained, a candidate has no right to complain if he is made to suffer from the misconduct of others selected or allowed by him to act for him, the seat may be avoided for bribery by agents, though without the knowledge of the sitting member.

It may be insinuated, or even openly charged, that Mr. Gerstmann is not worthy of belief. But this will not avail anything; for the record does not show even an attempt to impeach him by the examination of witnesses for that purpose, although the predicate was laid by the counsel for Mr. Romeis for so doing. Besides, Mr. Gerstmann is corroborated by Louis Jahn, one of the Republican judges of the election at that precinct, when asked:

22. What, if anything, do you know about any money being paid to voters there that day after the election was over?
(Objected to by contestee on the grounds of immateriality.)
A. Much as I know was about nineteen ticket peddlers around there, and Henry Gates paid them off the same night in Joe Boldt's grocery.
23. To what political party does Henry Gates belong?
(Objected to by contestee on the grounds of immateriality.)
A. To the Republican party; he was the vice-president of Precinct B.
24. What, if anything, do you know of the amounts of money paid to those nineteen persons by Henry Gates?
(Objected to by contestee on the grounds of immateriality).
A. As much as I know some of them got three dollars, some five, and a few got ten.
25. How long have you resided in that precinct?
A. Over eight years.
26. As a judge of the election, which political party did you represent?
A. The Republican.

What does all this conclusively prove? Certainly, that money was used for the purpose of corrupting this poll, and that the effort was successful. Mr. Gerstmann's statement is corroborated, and that portion of it which was objected to as merely hearsay evidence may now be lawfully used for the purpose of explanation and of making everything plain; and for the purpose, also, of illustrating the methods sometimes employed to defeat the will of the people.

When we remember that Mr. Elkins was not called upon to testify and deny the charge, if he could (although it is a fact, known to all of us, that he was accessible and could easily have been examined), when we remember that no one has attempted to tell us where the money came from with which the nineteen ticket peddlers were paid, and when we find that it took nineteen of such peddlers to peddle tickets in a precinct which cast less than 450 votes—the conviction is overwhelming that bribery and corruption ran riot that day in Precinct B, ward 8, of the city of Toledo, Ohio. The testimony of Mr. Warnke, as every lawyer knows, is merely negative testimony. It may be true, every word of it, and yet amount to nothing; he simply swears to what he knows of his own knowledge, and denies (so far as he knows anything about it) that any money was used to buy votes for Mr. Romeis. Mr. Jahn, on the other hand, tells how, when, where, and upon whom the controlling influence of money was brought to bear. He proves, as a fact, that money was used in paying off the ticket peddlers.

But it may be argued that the burden of proving the charge of bribery is upon Mr. Hurd; that no vote should be rejected until he shows that the elector was corrupted. This would serve every purpose if it was dealing with an individual. But the contestant has not attempted to prove the bribery in each individual instance; he has done far more, for he has proven that the poll at that precinct was corrupted. The

Bribery at elections has always been held a crime at common law, punishable by indictment or information. Both the bribed and the briber incur the penalty prescribed. If a vote secured by bribery, in direct violation of the statute, is to be counted, then the very object of the law, which is that it shall not be so obtained, is defeated, and so said the supreme court of Wisconsin.

These bribed votes should not be counted. The record furnishes no method for their elimination. Their acceptance can only be avoided by applying the rule of law, so well known and of such general adoption that it need scarcely be repeated here, that when illegal or fraudulent votes have been proven, and the poll can not be purged with reasonable certainty, the whole vote must be rejected.

I maintain that it is the duty of this House to reject the whole vote cast at Precinct B, ward 8, of the city of Toledo, because "the poll can not be purged with reasonable certainty." By so doing the apparent majority for Mr. Romeis is reduced from 239 to 19 votes, since the majority claimed for him at that precinct was 220.

The second ground assigned for this contest is that illegal votes were cast in the city of Toledo.

We will inquire, first, how was this fact found out; and, after learning the number of illegal votes, then let us determine what should be done with them, in justice to the parties interested, namely: the contestant, the contestee, and the people of the tenth Ohio district.

There is no registration law in Ohio. We can not determine, therefore, by a mere examination of the poll-list, that a certain voter named therein was or was not a legal voter.

There was but one way open to contestant, and he has pursued it. Two elections were held in that State in the year 1884, the one, held in October, for State officers and members of Congress, and the other, held in November, for electors of President and Vice-President. Taking the poll-lists of the two elections and by comparing them it was believed that 347 persons of those who had voted for a Congressman in that city were not lawful voters. In reaching this conclusion witnesses from each precinct of the city—persons who had lived there for many years—were called and examined as to the qualifications of those suspected of illegal voting. These witnesses were well acquainted with all the people of the respective precincts; they had been doing business with them, had held offices among them, had taken the lists of names and called in a number of prominent people from every part of each precinct to pass upon the names of the suspected illegal voters. They compared the lists, went from house to house personally to learn whether or not the persons named were legal voters, and found that they were not. Will any one say that a prima facie case was not thus made out?

In Blair vs. Barrett, May 22, 1860, 1 Bartlett, 30, it is said:

Many voters were charged to be non-residents—some of the State and more of the particular precinct in which they voted. The very nature of the charge shows the difficulty of the proof. It involves to a great extent proof of a negation respecting persons whose names are not even known; and, except in a few instances, where there may be a personal acquaintance with the man in another State, or in a distant part of the same State, the proof can hardly be from the nature of the case of a positive and direct character. In these cases the committee based their conclusions upon evidence that these men had never voted in that precinct before; were strangers to the old residents of the precinct, to individuals who had acted as judges and clerks of election for a great number of years; had no home or business in the precinct known to their best acquaintance, its home and business, and that they have disappeared from the day of the election, their whereabouts not having been discovered since even by the canvass-takers. With this evidence on the one side so easy of rebuttal by the production of the voter if a resident, or of some one else who knew him to be a resident, yet left uncontradicted, the committee could come to no other conclusion than to reject all such voters as illegal.

The contestee recognized the force of this evidence, and sought to show that the persons suspected were in fact legal voters. By his own showing the contestee failed to account for 73 votes, and we are now to decide what should be done with them. As to the remaining 275 votes (of the number of those suspected of being illegal) contestee undertook to prove that there had been a mistake made when the names were called at the polls; that since many were foreigners it happened that a wrong name had been entered by the clerks at the election, and that the names found in the city clerk's office were the true names of the voters whose right to vote had been called into question. For example, Peter Chuley had been entered by the election clerks as P. Judy. But I need not dwell upon this feature, for contestee fails to account for 73 votes, while contestant asserts that there were 191 votes which contestee did not and could not satisfactorily account for. What are we to do with these illegal votes, whatever the true number may be?

Let us begin with a proposition which no one should deny: That illegal votes can never entitle contestant to the seat; but may operate to deprive the sitting member of his seat in this House. The effect of such votes should be to avoid the election. What election? is the next question. Shall votes which were cast at boxes where no law was violated be thrown out? Surely, not so! We are not endeavoring to defeat, but rather to secure to the people of the tenth Ohio district the right of choosing their own Representative.

In Le Moyne vs. Farwell, Digest of 1871 and 1876, page 412, the committee approve the rule of Duffey (4 Brewster):

Upon news that fraudulent votes have been received the burden of proof falls upon the candidate acknowledged by the count to show that the person so voting was a legal voter or voted for his opponent; otherwise it will be presumed that they were polled and counted for him, and the poll will be purged by striking the whole number of such votes from his count.

Again, the doctrine is thus laid down in the case of Duffey (4 Brewster, page 531):

(1) It is the right of petitioners contesting an election, and also the right of the respondent, to examine the election papers on file in the proper office, and if it be apparent from them that persons have voted in any district whose names were not on the registry-list, without being vouched according to law, then prima facie all such votes are illegal. (2) When a contest has been inaugurated and complaint made, and notice given that such votes have been received, the burden of proof falls upon the candidate advantaged by the general count in such district to show either that the persons so voting possessed severally every qualification, or, if this be not so, that they voted for his opponent; he must lift the curse which the law imposes upon such ballots, otherwise it will be presumed that they were polled and counted for him; and thereupon the poll will be purged by striking the whole number of such votes from his count.

If, therefore, illegal votes should be rejected—and no one will deny it—there is, it seems to me, but one safe rule, and it is this, namely: Deduct the illegal votes from him having the majority in the precinct in question up to the number of his majority. This procedure amounts to a rejection of the whole poll, as it should do whenever the illegal votes equal or exceed the majority of the foremost candidate. If the number of illegal votes do not equal the majority of him having the highest vote, then what remains inures to his benefit. By this rule the honest voter is not disfranchised, and the candidate having the majority has no right to complain. Let us apply the rule to the present case. At the precincts which gave Mr. Romeis majorities there were cast 135 illegal votes. At the precincts which gave Mr. Hurd majorities there were 56 illegal votes cast. Since the majority in each instance for the respective candidates was greater than the number of illegal votes cast in the precinct we reach the result by simply deducting 56 from 135, and find that Mr. Romeis's apparent majority of 239 votes in the district must be reduced 79 votes. I will now read the table, showing fully what I have before expressed:

Precincts in Toledo giving Mr. Romeis a majority in each:

	Majority.
Precinct A, ward 2	22
Precinct B, ward 2	*11
Precinct C, ward 2	4
Precinct A, ward 3	29
Precinct B, ward 3	13
Precinct C, ward 3	7
Precinct B, ward 4	10
Precinct C, ward 5	12
Precinct B, ward 7	12

* Real majority 32.

From the following precincts in Toledo, which gave Mr. Hurd a majority, the following deductions should be made:

	Majority.
Precinct A, ward 4	14
Precinct C, ward 4	6
Precinct A, ward 5	14
Precinct B, ward 5	9
Precinct A, ward 7	3
	56

Deduct the one from the other, and it leaves 79 votes illegally cast in Toledo to be deducted from the apparent majority of the contestee.

We think that this is as favorable a view for the contestee as ought to be taken of these illegal votes.

We are next called upon to decide what should be done with the vote cast at Precinct C, ward 3, of the city of Toledo.

What are the facts, as shown by the testimony? It is that one Robert H. Bell, a partisan Republican, who had no right or business to be near the ballot-box, repeatedly put his hands into it while the counting was going on and handled the ballots, taking them out of the box and placing them upon the table. To properly estimate the enormity of such conduct, and to enable us in deciding what should be done with this poll, I will read the Ohio statute upon this subject. Section 7059 of the Revised Statutes provides:

Whoever at any election unlawfully, either by force, fraud, or other improper means, obtains or attempts to obtain possession of any ballot-box, or any ballots therein deposited, while the voting at such election is going on, or before the ballots are duly taken out of such box and enumerated by the judges of the election, according to law, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not more than three years nor less than one year.

And the following extract from the brief filed in this case on behalf of the contestant:

The act here prohibited is not merely the fraudulent taking posession of ballots, but the illegal taking of them by any improper means. This shows the view in which the Ohio statute holds the giving of any opportunity to unauthorized persons to tamper with the votes.

The New York case, above referred to, is the case of Cary vs. Twombly, New York Contested-Election Cases, page 474. There it is said:

The irregularity urged before the committee on protest of the board of canvassers * * * and before the committee of this house in relation to the eighteenth district of the sixteenth ward consists in the fact that Mr. William Terhune, a person not an inspector, participated in the canvass of the votes for members of assembly, and performed acts and duties allowed by law to be performed only by an inspector of election.

The fact of the participation of the said Terhune, in handling the ballots before they were counted, was * * * fully established before your committee. It was also shown by the evidence.

It also appeared that a person occupying the position of Mr. Terhune, and handling the ballots as he was known to have handled them, could have substituted ballots of the contesting member for the sitting member. In other words, that he could have substituted one ballot for another. It further appeared before your committee that said Terhune was a friend and partisan of the contestant, and a Republican in politics, holding the position of Republican supervisor, under the late statutes of the United States relating to elections. It further appeared that said Terhune took no part in the canvass of the general or Congressional ballots; but only took part in the canvass of the assembly ballots. It was not pretended or claimed that Terhune's appointment by Judge Woodruff as a United States supervisor gave him any authority to interfere or take part in the canvass of the assembly ballots.

While your committee do not desire to cast any imputation on Mr. Terhune more than appears in the evidence, your committee can not fail to suggest that while Mr. Terhune had an opportunity to appear and testify before the committee * * * and was also subpœned, * * * in both instances he has failed to present himself to make any excuse or explanation for his participation in the canvass of the assembly ballots of the eighteenth district of the sixteenth ward.

Your committee have carefully considered the evidence on this branch of the case; and while they would be unwilling to reject any poll upon mere technicalities, yet in the case of the poll of the eighteenth district of the sixteenth ward, in the judgment of your committee, the violation of the law in allowing Mr. Terhune, not an inspector, to handle the votes for member of assembly is palpable, and it offered an opportunity for the commission of fraud.

Your committee, therefore, upon due deliberation have rejected the poll or votes for each of the parties in said district.

If, now, the offense of handling the ballot is one so heinous that a man must be imprisoned for not less than one nor more than three years in the penitentiary, we might well hesitate to receive the vote of that precinct. But there is more to influence one in deciding the question. In the first place, it seems that the defeat of Hurd was deemed a matter of national importance, and a large sum of money was expended by the party to which Bell belonged in order to carry another precinct for Mr. Romeis. Secondly, the effort by Bell to avoid the necessary result of his interference with the ballots is a circumstance of great weight, and should lead us, I think, to reject the entire poll. This course will commend itself, in the light of the following reply from the witness David Emerich. He was asked:

8. Q. State in what way, if any, Robert H. Bell interfered at the time of the October election, 1884, in Precinct C of the third ward, with the work of the judges and clerks in polling and counting the vote of that election.

(Question objected to as leading and not rebuttal).

A. He took tickets out of the ballot-box, put them on the table, took my polling-sheet and wrote a lot of names while I was gone to dinner.

DAVID EMERICK.

A candid examination of the testimony satisfies my mind that the interference with the ballots was at the October election, and not at the November election, as Mr. Bell would have us believe. He does not deny interfering. The only point he seeks to make is that it was not at the Congressional election. Under all the circumstances an unprejudiced mind will believe the testimony of a disinterested witness, and decide that he did so interfere at the October election.

One of the most painful circumstances to the average citizen connected with this contest is in the proof, which was laid before the committee, as to the intimidation of voters on Kelley's Island. This island lies upon the bosom of Lake Erie, about 20 miles from the mainland. There lives Mr. Norman Kelley, a gentleman whose devotion to his party can not be questioned. Largely interested in two kinds of business, he gave employment to many operatives. These men were dependent upon him for their daily bread. With his favor, they could take care of and provide a support for their wives and little children; to provoke his displeasure was to invite destitution, with all its attendant horrors.

There were seventy men of them, and they voted between 5 and 6 o'clock in the afternoon, during which time Mr. Kelley was at the polls. He had urged them beforehand to vote against Mr. Hurd, and standing at the door of the house where the election was held he told his men that he wanted to see their tickets; in some instances required them to show him their tickets. When one of his men came away from the polls whom he supposed had voted for Mr. Hurd, he said to him that "he would be one of the first to go." The testimony shows that Mr. Kelley was not in the habit of going around the polls, but on this occasion, as one John Woodford had sent word to him that things were not going very well at the polls and he must come up, he went to the polls and acted as I have related. A more cruel piece of intimidation could not have been practiced upon poor, dependent voters. The key-note may be found in the statement which Mr. Kelley made to the witness Frederick Alvord, namely: "He [Mr. Kelley] then said that he did not consider it intimidation, but that it was a matter of business with him; that he had to protect his own interests." In one word, he felt warranted in resorting to what every one will denominate intimidation in order to defend his pecuniary interest against the anticipated evils of the election of a free-trader.

In Richardson vs. Rainey, Digest of 1876-'80, page 228, it is said:

The party that threatens such loss of employment, entailing want, privation, and suffering, is just as culpable as one who resorts to bribery to accomplish political ends.

And upon this subject the law of Ohio is clear and severe:

Section 7065 of the Ohio Revised Statutes provides that "if an employer of laborers, or an agent of such employer, threatens to withhold or reduce the wages of or to dismiss from service any laborer in his employ, * * * shall be fined not more than $2,000 or less than $100, or imprisoned in the penitentiary not more than three years."

At this precinct the majority for Mr. Romeis was 29 votes. The number of Norman Kelley's men was seventy. Will it not be even more than justice to Mr. Romeis to simply reject this poll? True, a lesson should be taught employers who drive their employés to the polls like sheep to the shambles; and since Mr. Kelley became (as I have already shown in the case of Mr. Gerstmann) the agent of Mr. Romeis, that gentleman can not be heard to complain if we deduct the entire illegal vote from the number of votes which were returned by the election managers as cast for him. It is said in the report of the committee that there is no evidence that any one was intimidated and that this ground of contest is not well taken. The reply is an easy one, and I think equally conclusive, namely, that it was believed by Mr. Romeis's friends that intimidation was necessary; that Mr. Kelley was sent for certainly to control his employés, and that he went to the polls and there used such means as were well calculated to intimidate the poor and dependent employé, and that the precinct gave a majority for Mr. Romeis. If this evidence, the best which the nature of the case permits, does not convince you that the entire vote of the precinct should be rejected, then we of the minority have mistaken the temper of this House.

In view of all this I am ready to-day, as I was when the vote was taken in our committee, to again declare by my vote, my unfaltering conviction, that Frank H. Hurd is entitled to his seat as the Representative from the tenth Ohio district.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill (S. 60) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCook, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. 2239) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the original owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War.

HURD VS. ROMEIS.

Mr. ROBERTSON resumed the floor and yielded to Mr. CROXTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN] has consumed twenty minutes of the time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the arrangement, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CROXTON] has fifteen minutes in his own right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON] has twenty-eight minutes remaining.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But I want the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CROXTON] to take the floor in his own time.

Mr. CROXTON. Then I am to speak fifteen minutes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That is the understanding.

Mr. CROXTON. Mr. Speaker, I can hardly say that I regret on this first occasion when I address the House of Representatives that I find myself occupying a somewhat curious position. Upon the committee with me I find gentlemen of distinction who differ very widely with their political brethren with whom I found myself associated as to the right of this remarkable case. I repeat, I can not say that I regret this, although we have the example on the other side of a solid front, without one shadow of wavering as to what their opinions are in this remarkable case. We Democrats claim the right to differ. I regret that that right should have been indulged in on this occasion on Mr. Hurd's account, but as far as I am concerned it is a source of congratulation to me that I am with gentlemen who have expressed their opinion candidly, as I mean to express mine.

Now, sir, the first question I shall treat in this case is this charge of bribery—not specific acts of bribery, not that A or B or C were bribed—but that there was a general bribery at this particular precinct in the city of Toledo which corrupted the poll at that precinct and rendered it unworthy to be counted in an election; that that bribery pervaded the entire result there and rendered it absolutely null and void. What evidence is there of that fact? Bribery and fraud, Mr. Speaker, can not be proven as you prove a debt. It is not required, under the law, that you should substantiate a charge of that sort as you would a debt, an ascertained fact about which men may differ, but the proof of which is up to the hub on one side or the other.

There is no court in Christendom, the highest in the land, that ever dreams of expecting bribery or fraud to be proven as you would prove a conceded fact, one way or the other, where one man claims one thing and the other another. How do you prove it then? By circumstances. Circumstances are frequently the best evidence in the world. Now, what are the circumstances that lead up to the conviction that there was general bribery at this particular precinct? Is there a man here, or is there a man on that committee, who entertains a shadow of doubt that this man Gerstmann went to that precinct for the purpose for which he says he went there?

Can any man who reads, or hears stated, the facts connected with Gerstmann's visit there doubt that he went there, and went for the purpose which he says carried him there? What was that purpose? To ascertain the condition of affairs in that precinct. Why was that precinct selected? The population was made up largely of Germans and Poles, and this man spoke both languages. He was then a proper man to go there, for he could converse with the people. He did go. There is no earthly question about that fact. He mingled and conversed with those people, and he reported to Mr. Brown, representing the State committee of Ohio, the fact that "the entire current is in favor of Frank Hurd; the people in this precinct are all in favor of Hurd." By the advice of these people at Toledo he goes to the State committee and reports what he had found. Then the question was, "What will cure the trouble?" "Money." "How much?" "Two or three thousand dollars."

What does he do next? He goes to visit the national executive committee, and there is not a man here who doubts the fact that Gerstmann had an interview with Mr. Elkins and some other members of that committee. He tells them what he has learned in Ohio. He states the fact as he had stated it in Ohio; and he repeats when he gets back the assurance which had been given him, which was, "Money shall be forthcoming; we can not send it through you; it must go through the proper channels; that is the custom, and we must follow it; but the money shall be forthcoming." He did not say that he carried the money. There is not a shadow of evidence in this case that he asked to be permitted to carry it. He did what he was engaged to do. He went to that precinct, ascertained the condition of things, and made report.

Did the money go there? How can we prove this? How can any man prove that two or three thousand dollars was carried there, unless by putting Mr. Elkins or some other member of the national committee on the stand? Did the money go there? This man testifies that he was requested to go back there, and did go, just preceding the election, and found a complete revolution in the sentiment of those people. The direct question is asked him, "What produced this change?" He says: "Money and other things that were brought to bear." Everything he said would happen did happen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it not as plain to the mind of every man here as that "two and two make four" that if this man lied it was the easiest thing in the world for Mr. Romeis to show that he lied? Why did he not do it?

Mr. ROBERTSON. He could have put Mr. Elkins himself on the stand.

Mr. CROXTON. Why did not Mr. Romeis undertake to prove that the statements of Gerstmann were false? Why, sir, if Mr. Elkins had simply written a note to Mr. Romeis saying "the whole story is a lie," the refutation would have been brought out, and this whole evidence of Gerstmann would have been completely overturned.

Mr. Romeis, if Gerstmann's statement was false, might have put upon the stand the chairman of the State committee of Ohio, who might have testified: "This fellow never approached me; I never had anything to do with him; I know nothing in the world about him." Mr. Romeis and his friends had it entirely within their power to crush the whole of this evidence, but they did not attempt to do it.

But they say it is hearsay evidence. What sort of hearsay evidence? What did Mr. Gerstmann hear? Why, he heard what he was sent to inquire for—the condition of sentiment at Toledo. What did he do? He reported it where he was expected to report it. For what purpose? That appliances might be brought to bear to revolutionize the state of things at that precinct. The advice which he gave was acted on; and the result followed precisely as he said it would follow the liberal use of money.

Now, I do not want to be misunderstood. We do not charge that there were specific acts of bribery, but we say this large sum of money was sent there to debauch and corrupt that precinct, and it had its effect.

Gentlemen talk about the personal popularity of Mr. Romeis there in local contests. It is hardly necessary for me to say, at least to my Southern friends, that such considerations do not weigh a feather in contests of this kind with us; and I do not believe the case is different at the North. Especially do I not believe it is different in Ohio; for gentlemen may, as did my friend from New York just now, compliment the freemen of Ohio just as highly as they please, but unless history lies most egregiously, large sums of money have been used, and successfully used, in that State for years, and have had the result sought and anticipated.

Now, who was Mr. Girstmann? He was the agent of these very people, the very man that they sent there; and his statements are not hearsay statements at all. He states the facts which came to his knowledge by contact with the people whom he was sent to visit. And the very result which he told them would follow did follow. What attempt has been made to break him down? They actually attempt to break him down by the testimony of Mr. Brown, the lawyer who examined him, the very man he went to consult with when he went to Ohio upon this business. I do not wish to be understood as intimating that the men who are the go-betweens or agents between the briber and the men sought to be bribed are the best witnesses whose testimony we can have; but I do say that the man who encourages another to act in that capacity is the last one on earth who ought to be believed if he undertakes to attack the agent for doing what he engaged him to do. Mr. Gerstmann accomplished the job he contracted for; and whatever discredit may attach to him attaches with tenfold greater weight to the parties who engaged him to do that dirty work which they were afraid or ashamed to do themselves.

Did he do it? If he did, is not that poll then corrupted and destroyed? It is corrupt, gone, and ought not to be counted in a contest where fairness and observance of law are required to be kept in view. As far as my opinion goes, I have not a shadow of doubt upon the subject.

Local elections prove nothing. I have witnessed numbers of instances, where no political issue was at stake, where gentlemen—because of their personal influence and great popularity—have been carried into office by a very large majority. It is the hardest matter in the world to draw political lines in an election for local offices throughout the country.

Now, why was this man Gerstmann sent down there to the city of Toledo on the part of this syndicate? It was a vital matter with them that the contestant in this case [Mr. Hurd] should not be elected to Congress, because he was a free-trader. And these people were told they must destroy him. Why was a syndicate selected for the purpose, and why was this man Gerstmann selected to do the work? The work designed to be accomplished could be accomplished in the city better than in the country. He was sent to the very place where these Germans and Poles were located, and because they were to a great extent strangers to our own people it was supposed they might be influenced more readily by a stranger because he spoke their language. This was the reason why this syndicate was raised and that man sent among these Germans and Poles to influence their vote against Mr. Hurd.

Is that all? To give way to the testimony in this case would force one to the conclusion every man connected with that election was corrupted. Judges were debauched, clerks were debauched, and the whole proceedings carried on in fraud and utter disregard of law and with contempt for all the observances required on a solemn occasion of record. In that town they took one of the judges outside of the precinct in which these people were expected to vote. They had four hundred and odd voters, and it was not difficult, it seems to me, to find enough men there sufficiently qualified to constitute the judges of election.

The testimony shows as to some of these men they were extremely ordinary in every sense of the term. I do not wish to discuss questions of law in the brief time allotted to me, as my friend from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN] who preceded me, has covered that ground almost entirely. But if the law of Ohio does not peremptorily require the selection of these judges of election from residents within the precinct, then I should like to have that fact appear.

Mr. WISE. Will my colleague permit me to ask him whether it is contrary to the laws of Ohio to take a judge outside of the precinct?

Mr. CROXTON. That is unquestionably the spirit of the law; and I thank my distinguished colleague, who is a member of the committee with me, for suggesting the idea by asking the question.

Mr. TURNER. I did not make the suggestion.

Mr. CROXTON. I ask whether any one ever heard of a single instance of a judge of election being appointed outside of the precinct where the election was held? I myself never heard of a judge of election being taken from outside of a precinct.

But this man outside of the precinct was selected as one of the judges of this election. What does that man say of the result of that election? He says positively he does not know what the result was. Another judge says distinctly he certified the poll knowing it to be false. The clerk who kept the record of the votes there testifies he does not know what the true poll was, and no man could tell what it was.

Was it a legal certificate of the vote of that place? Did it comply with one single requirement of the statutory law of the State of Ohio? It did not. Was it the thing aimed at? Was it a result obtained which you could act upon? Was it a fact certified according to law sworn to in advance—if they are sworn there—and I do not know whether they are or not required under that law to do certain things, but not a single thing required was done. And after the work was accomplished they proclaimed on the witness stand they had certified to what was not true.

Is that the result of the election? I have, Mr. Speaker, as high a regard and as sacred a feeling for a spotless and unstained ballot as any man in America. I believe, Virginian though I am, in a free ballot and a fair count, but I believe a free ballot and a fair count should be cast according to the principles of the law. I can say to my friends on the other side of the House if there is a man on earth who ought to be for a free ballot and a fair count it is a son of Virginia, where the infamies of a Republican administration have been brought to bear against us by everything ingenuity could suggest or invent.

But in having that free ballot and fair count I want it according to law; and if the law is not observed I am an advocate for throwing out the thing you call a poll, and the result of the election, and rejecting it entirely, proclaiming to the world that there has been no election.

Why? The law defines what an election is. It prescribes the mode of conducting and consummating it; and if you depart from the law you have done the thing that you had no right to do.

Oh, but the cry is raised you deprive honest voters of the right to vote. Who does it? The law. It is said you will deny men their rights as freemen. I ask again, who does it? The law. Complain of that, if you want to complain. Make your election officers obey the law, repeal or change it if a change be needed, but as long as the statute of the State of Ohio or of any other State is in force do not violate that statute, and then come before Congress or the world and ask that a man shall be declared duly elected when the very groundwork of his claim is unwarranted by a line or a letter of the law of his own State. He has no right to it, and it is useless to discuss it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia has consumed fifteen minutes of his time.

Mr. WISE. But the gentleman can proceed in his own time.

Mr. CROXTON. No; I am tied down to fifteen minutes. Well, I hardly know whether I am glad or sorry. [Applause.]

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, in supporting the majority report of the committee within the limited time I have, I will briefly call the attention of the House to certain facts as shown by the records in this case, and endeavor to ascertain upon what the contestant relies when he asks this House to set aside the election of Mr. Romeis, notwithstanding his majority of 239 votes, and to award him the seat.

In my judgment the contestant, in seeking for an excuse for his defeat, has failed to look in the proper direction. All his claims that there was an organized conspiracy entered into by the leaders of the Republican party, both State and national, to compass his overthrow are founded upon such unworthy testimony that I am sure no court of justice, much less the House of Representatives of the United States, will give a verdict in his favor.

The contestant claims that money was raised in different portions of the country and sent into his district for the purpose of bribing the voters in the interest of his opponent; that there was wholesale fraud and corruption, many illegal votes being cast; that in a certain district the ballots were tampered with, in another many illegal votes cast, and in another an attempt to intimidate the voters.

Now, let us see upon what kind of evidence these charges are based. And first we will examine the charges of bribery and corruption. Nowhere does the contestant show by any except hearsay evidence that there was a dollar spent to bribe or corrupt the voters of this district; nowhere does he show in the evidence that there was a dollar of money sent into this district to be used for the purpose of bribing and corrupting the voters.

The contestant bases his charge of money being sent into this district on the testimony of one Gerstmann, who, in his direct examination, swears that he was sent by the national Republican committee into the tenth district of Ohio, prior to the election held in October, 1884, for the purpose of looking over the ground and ascertaining the status of the campaign. He says that he visited a district where there were Polish and German voters, and that he learned on his first visit to that district that Mr. Hurd stood a good chance of election, but that the sentiment could be changed if money was sent there, some persons naming $2,000 or $3,000 as being necessary to accomplish this, and that he reported this to the Republican headquarters; that they refused to send any money to the State committee of Ohio through him, and that he was told to go back and tell the Republican committee to do all they could to elect the Republican ticket; but that on a second visit to this same district, made later, he found that the sentiment had been changed, and that instead of its being for Mr. Hurd, as at the time of his first visit, it was against Hurd, and he supposed there had been money sent for the purpose of bribery and corruption, as he had seen the people "jargooning" together. But nowhere does he say, on the contrary he affirms, that no money was sent by him (nor could he be trusted with any), nor does he show that one dollar was sent to the State. After being hard pressed by the attorney for the contestee, he admitted that there was but two or three weeks' time between his visits to Toledo; consequently within that time he must have gone to the Republican headquarters in New York, the money must have been sent to Toledo, and the voters corrupted. Is such a thing possible?

Now, let us take up the cross-examination of this witness and see what that discloses: Mr. Gerstmann swears that he had lived in Ohio since April, 1884, and that he had lived in a Southern State from 1856 to 1870; that at the commencement of the rebellion he was in business in Georgia. To avoid conscription in the confederate army he appointed himself a Jewish rabbi, traveling around over the country speculating during the week, and on Sunday, if called upon, performing the duties of his office; that he was an itinerant; that for many years since the war he has been traveling over the country, first on the Pacific coast, then back to Georgia or Florida, one month in Arkansas, the next in Pennsylvania; has always been a Democrat; was a supporter of General Hancock in 1880, and had General Hancock been elected expected to receive an office. He would not give the names of any of the leading members of the churches to which he ministered, nor refer to any leading citizen residing anywhere that he had lived—in fact, a "Wandering Jew," with no permanent abode; nor could he show any letter of authority for him to act for the Republican party.

On the cross-examination he swears that while in Ohio he was in communication with the Democratic State committee, and showed letters and telegrams purporting to be from the Democratic national committeemen, one being from Mr. Smalley, the secretary, trying to convince every one with whom he was brought in contact that he was a man of importance, and should be cultivated. When with the Republicans he tried to impress them with the statement that he was a trusted leader of the Republican party, with an important mission for the national committee. When with the Democrats he talked freely of his intimacy with Mr. Smalley, secretary, and with Mr. Barnum, chairman of the national Democratic committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it proper to suppose that such a man as this Mr. Gerstmann would have been sent by the chairman of the Republican national committee upon the important mission he claims he was intrusted with; that is, going into a section of the country where he was totally unacquainted to confer with the party leaders there to ascertain the status of the public mind so that the leaders could intelligently act in reference to the work necessary to be done? In the first place, this man shows himself totally unfitted for the position; and in the second, as not worthy to be trusted by any one. So far, many charges have been made against the gentlemen who conducted the Republican campaign in 1884, but no one has ever accused them of being so foolish as to employ such agents as this man Gerstmann. I am satisfied, and so is every one who has carefully read the testimony of this man, that he was never employed by the Republican committee.

It is upon the testimony of this man alone that the contestant relies to prove the attempt to bribe the voters of the tenth Congressional district of Ohio. No other witness does he introduce to corroborate the testimony of Gerstmann; nor does he show by Gerstmann any documents, letters, or orders to support his statements.

But this is not all, Mr. Speaker. This man Gertsmann in his testimony names certain men in the tenth district with whom he claims to have had certain conversations and from whom he received information. One especially, Mr. Warnke, of Toledo, who denies in every particular all to which Gertsmann testifies, and swears that he never told him anything in reference to the voters of the precinct in which he resides; that all the conversation he ever had with Gertsmann was when he came into his saloon and asked concerning the election, saying, "What do you think of this election?" Warnke replying that he did not know, Gertsmann then asked if he was acquainted with certain men in the town who were Democrats, and invited Warnke to go down town with him; Warnke declining, Gertsmann "ordered a pony beer" and then left. Mr. Speaker, this House will require better evidence than that of this man Gertsmann before the contestant can hope to prove the conspiracy he charges was entered into to defeat his election to Congress. If this large amount of money was expended in the tenth district, as contestant charges, some traces of it could be found, and the active, energetic friends who aided contestant in the contest would long since have discovered the clue.

The contestant tries to show by the testimony of one Jahn that there was money paid to bribe the voters of a certain precinct. Mr. Jahn says that one Henry Gates had paid nineteen ticket peddlers the night of the election; that some of the peddlers got $3, some $5, and others got as much as $10; but when Mr. Jahn was asked if he was present at the time or knew that the money was paid, he testifies that he was told such was the case—entirely hearsay testimony. Now, sir, there is no proof or testimony which would be received in any court that one dollar was illegally spent by the contestee or his friends in the tenth Congressional district of Ohio during the campaign of 1884. On the contrary, it is shown that no money had been furnished by the contestee or his friends, and that no money was used in that election excepting for legitimate expenses. There is no question but that the ticket peddlers were paid by the Republican campaign committee, as is the custom everywhere, and I suppose the Democratic campaign committee in that district did the same thing. These men were employed for the purposeof distributing tickets; their time was given and they were paid for it; but they were not employed or paid for the purpose of wrongfully influencing voters; it was simply a reimbursement for the time they had lost on the day of election.

Another specification: The contestant charges that in Precinct B of the eighth ward the election was so loosely conducted that it was impossible to ascertain the true vote of that precinct. He claims that the tickets were so carelessly counted and the poll-book kept in such a manner that it was impossible to make them agree, and that because of this he claims the whole precinct should be thrown out. The testimony shows that when the tickets which had been deposited were counted there was a difference between the number of tickets counted and the number of names on the poll-book—from five to seven—and one witness, Louis Jahn, swears that they could not make the two agree, always being more ballots than names on the books. Now, the facts are and the evidence shows that when the ballots were first counted they were in excess of the names on the poll-book; the second count showedless, but when they had been tallied and accurately counted it was shown that there were 4 less ballots cast than there were names on the poll-book, and the judges, without authority of law for so doing, to make it "tally," as they said, added 2 votes to each of the candidates for Congress, as well as for all other officers voted for, there being 326 ballots in the ballot-box, while the poll-book showed 330 names.

Now, if this was irregular, and I think it was, deduct the two votes from each of the two candidates, and you have not changed the result; but there is nothing in the testimony to show that there was any attempt at fraud in this precinct, or that the election there was not fairly or honestly conducted. All the witnesses agree to that; and if these judges did transcend their authority in their anxiety to make the poll-book and ballots agree, they showed no disposition to harm any one, nor is there any reason why this precinct should be excluded. Now all the authorities agree to this view: That the most that could be done was to throw out the 4 votes added to make the ballots correspond with the number in the ballot-box.

The contestant also charges that there were counted many fraudulent votes that were cast in the city of Toledo; and to prove this he has the poll-books used at the October election compared with the poll-books used at the November election, and the names appearing on the books as having voted at the October election and not appearing on the books for the November election he claims were fraudulent and should be thrown out. As the House well knows, the election for Representative to Congress took place in October, and the election for Presidential electors in November, 1884. The list of voters contestant furnished to the contestee as being irregular contained 347 names, and months after this election the contestee was able, by unimpeachable witnesses, to show that 275 of the 347 were regular voters, and were then residing within the city of Toledo, and that a large number, nearly one-half, had voted for the contestant for Representative in Congress.

When the House considers that Toledo is a populous city, containing a large number of men employed on railways, who are constantly changing their residence, is it not surprising that five or six months after the election so many of these citizens who had voted could be traced and accounted for? The contestant must furnish the House better testimony than has been relied upon before the charge of irregular voting will have any weight or influence. If there were 72 illegal votes cast on the day of election, will this committee allow the contestant to charge that all these have been cast for the contestee without showing for whom the ballots were cast? I think not. The law is too plain and too well understood by this House to be applied in that way.

The contestant makes another charge; that is, an attempt to intimidate the voters of Kelley's Island precinct, in Erie County. This is a small voting precinct, casting a little over 200 votes, and has at Presidential elections heretofore been Republican; giving in 1880 a majority of 41 to Garfield. At the October election in this precinct Mr. Romeis received 126, and Mr. Hurd 97 votes. In the Presidential election in the following month Mr. Blaine received 131 votes, 5 more than Mr. Romeis, and Mr. Cleveland 87 votes, or 10 less than Mr. Hurd had received the preceding month. From this it will be seen that there could have been no attempt at intimidation in October, unless there had been greater in the following month.

It appears that Mr. Kelley, for whom the island is named, works a stone quarry, and has in his employ sixty or seventy men, and that he was a very earnest Republican, declaring himself to be such to his men and to all with whom he came in contact. He thought if Mr. Hurd was elected and Mr. Hurd's ideas prevailed it would be detrimental to his business interests; and he explained his views to his men, urging all of them to vote as he did. There is nothing in the testimony to warrant the assumption that Mr. Kelley attempted to force his men to vote the Republican ticket, but on the contrary it is shown that while a number of them voted the Republican ticket others voted the Democratic ticket; and the man who is said to have been followed by Mr. Kelley to see how he voted, and one that was intimidated, swears that Mr. Kelley did not follow him, that he saw him when he voted, and that was all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have briefly called the attention of the House to some of the facts in this case, as I gather them from the record. There is nothing in the evidence presented to warrant the assumption that there was bribery, corruption, or an attempt at intimidation of the voters of the tenth Congressional district of Ohio. On the contrary, I believe the election was fairly and honestly conducted. That Mr. Hurd did not poll the full Democratic vote, there is no question; that the Democrats were bribed or forced to vote for the contestee, I do not believe.

At preceding elections when Mr. Hurd has been a candidate for Representative in Congress his vote has fallen far behind his ticket. For instance, in 1882 Mr. Hurd's majority over Mr. King, Republican candate, was 1,104, while the Democratic candidate for secretary of state in the counties composing the tenth district had a majority of 3,720 over his Republican competitor; Mr. Hurd losing 9 per cent. of the Democratic vote. In 1884 the Democratic candidate for secretary of state had in this district a majority of 2,706 over his Republican competitor, and Mr. Hurd lost but 8 per cent. of the Democratic vote. So in 1882 Mr. Hurd lost more Democratic votes than he did in 1884, when, as he charges, there was a conspiracy to defeat him and money was used for that purpose. The facts are that Mr. Hurd was defeated by members of his own political party, who announced after the nomination had been made that they would not support him, but would support the Republican nominee, whoever he might be.

Mr. Hurd has been a candidate for Congress seven times; three times he has been successful, and four times defeated. He has never polled the full vote of his party in his district, his positive convictions upon economic questions have raised bitter opponents within his own party, and they were surprised that the majority against him was not more decisive.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the sitting member was fairly and honestly elected, that a majority of the legal votes in the tenth district of Ohio were cast for him, and that he is entitled to retain his seat; and that if this House should seat the contestant upon the flimsy and weak showing made it would not be impossible to successfully assail the seat of any member upon this floor.

[Before the conclusion of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time yielded to the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. DORSEY asked and obtained leave to extend his remarks as above.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TURNER. Let us go on for a half hour longer.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 76.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. The questions of law and fact involved in this case have been studied by me long and carefully, and I have endeavored in so doing not to be actuated by feelings of partisan bias or partiality, and I believe that this House, if it will give to these questions the like patient study and investigation, will arrive at the same result: that the contestant, Frank H. Hurd, was duly elected a member of this House from the tenth district of Ohio at the last regular Congressional election, and that the contestee, Jacob Romeis, was not so elected.

Upon the face of the returns Mr. Romeis, the sitting member, has a majority of 239. Mr. Hurd claims that the returns from three precincts should be rejected, and that certain illegal votes should be deducted from contestee's majority in the city of Toledo, and that the true result would show a majority for contestant of 255. The contestant first impeaches the return from Precinct B, ward 8, in the city of Toledo, and asks that it be rejected upon the following grounds:

(1) The two Republican judges appointed were residents of the precinct, while the Democratic judge was not. Upon an examination of the statute and its context I am thoroughly persuaded that this was an undoubted violation of the spirit if not of the letter of the statute. (Revised Statutes of Ohio, section 2933.) The very purpose of the law was to require the judges of election to reside in the same vicinage or neighborhood with the voters. The law intended that the judges and the voters should live together in the same election precinct and vote at the same box. Any other construction is narrow, strained, and illiberal. Qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice—"It is the letter which killeth."

Did the statute intend that a judge should be appointed for a precinct in which he did not reside and in which he could not vote? Why was James Kelley, a Democrat residing in Precinct C, eighth ward, appointed to act as judge in Precinct B? He could not vote in the latter precinct, and if he performed his duties faithfully, as the statute required, he could not vote any where on that day; and, so far as the evidence shows, he did not vote; or, if we suppose that he did, he must have abandoned his post without authority of law. I do not know what the reasons were for Mr. Kelley's appointment, but certainly the effect was to disfranchise him, or to force him to exercise the privilege of a voter at the expense of neglecting, at some possibly critical period during the day, the important duties imposed upon him by law. I do not believe the statute we are considering will bear such an unfair and unreasonable construction.

(2) Both clerks were Republicans, while the statute required them to be of different politics (section 2933).

(3) At the close of the polls all the ballots were taken from the ballot-box and put upon the table in the presence of a large number of persons, twenty-five or more. The statute required the ballot-box to be opened and the ballots to be taken out one at a time by one of the judges, who must read aloud distinctly, while the ticket remains in his hand, the names thereon contained, and then deliver it to the second judge, who must examine the same and pass it on to the third judge, who must string it on a thread and carefully preserve it, &c. (section 2957).

(4) The ballots were then counted two or three times by two of the judges. The first count showed 7 ballots in excess of the names on the poll-books. A second count showed 3 or 4 ballots in excess of the names. Louis Jahn, a Republican judge, testified "that the tickets never did correspond with the tally-sheet," and in answer to the following question, "What did you then do with the tickets?" said:

Another count then took place, and still the tally-sheets did not agree.

The same witness also testified, in response to a question by Mr. Romeis on cross-examination, that the clerks made "the great mistake right along with the tally-sheet, and that one of the clerks always had more votes than the other; and afterward they fixed the tally-sheet among themselves so that both would be alike." (Record, page 72, question 118.) He also swore on the same cross-examination that the clerks made "lots of mistakes on the tally-sheet." (Question 141.) He also said that he finally "moved that the judges should give every Democratic candidate 2 votes and every Republican candidate 2 votes," and that "they done it, and still they had more tickets left." (Answer to question 13, page 68.)

Mr. Jahn further stated that at the time when the 2 additional votes were added to each candidate no one of the judges or clerks could tell the true number of votes. (Answer to question 279, page 80.)

And so it seems that the attempt "to force a balance" did not succeed, but failed completely.

James Kelley, the Democratic judge, also testified to the same effect:

Q. 9, p. 29. What was done with the ballots?
A. They were taken out by handfuls and left on the table; then we counted them. * * *
Q. 11. When you finished, state whether the tally-sheets of the clerks agreed.
A. No; they did not agree.
Q. 12. What did the clerks do to make them agree?
A. They fixed them up some way; between them they got them alike.

Fred. Kolbown, judge, and Fred. Rachow, clerk—both Republicans—were not examined by the contestee. Why not?

(5) The poll-books were not signed until late at night, after the votes had been counted and after the tallies and the poll-books had been altered and "fixed up." The statute required the poll-book to be signed by the judges and attested by the clerks, &c., at the close of the polls (section 2956); but this requirement was not complied with.

It thus appears that every substantial requirement of the statute regulating the holding of the election and the counting of the votes was persistently, repeatedly, and deliberately violated.

The reply to all this evidence is that the judges only committed "immaterial errors," "which did not affect the result," and that they were guilty "of mere irregularities, which could not void the election in the absence of fraud or corruption." But is there no evidence here of fraud or corruption? Every opportunity was afforded the judges and others, clerks and bystanders, for the abstraction, the displacement, and the substitution of ballots. If this House believes the uncontradicted facts testified to by the witnesses Kelley and Jahn, the conclusion is inevitable and irresistible that actual fraud, whether committed by the judges or others, has vitiated the whole election held at Precinct B, ward 8, in the city of Toledo. The certified result in this precinct is shown to be "so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deduced therefrom."

It is insisted, however, that the election requirements of the statutes of Ohio are directory merely, and not mandatory, and that therefore it is immaterial to inquire whether these directory requirements were complied with or not.

But I do not so understand the law. It is only innocent and unintentional variations from the provisions of the directory statutes themselves which can be permitted with impunity.

Judge Cooley (Constitutional Limitations, page 77), in referring to the rules "which are to be made use of in determining whether the provisions of a statute are mandatory or directory," says:

Those directions which are not of the essence of the thing to be done, but which are given with a view merely to the proper, orderly, and prompt conduct of the business, and by a failure to obey which the rights of those interested will not be prejudiced, are not commonly to be regarded as mandatory; and if the act is performed, but not in the time or in the precise mode indicated, it may still be sufficient if that which is done accomplishes the substantial purpose of the statute. * * * Even as thus laid down and restricted, the doctrine is one to be applied with much circumspection; for it is not to be denied that the courts sometimes, in their anxiety to sustain the proceedings of careless or incompetent officers, have gone very far in substituting a judicial view of what was essential for that declared by the Legislature.

In the same connection, Judge Cooley commends the views of Lewis, chief-justice, in Corbett vs. Bradley (7 Nev., 108; Constitutional Limitations, 76):

When any requirement of a statute is held to be directory, and therefore not material to be followed, it is upon the assumption that the Legislature itself so considered it. * * * No court certainly has the right to hold any requirement of a law unnecessary, unless it be manifest the Legislature did not intend to impose the consequence which would naturally follow from a non-compliance, or which would result from holding the requirement mandatory or indispensable.

Whether the provisions of the Ohio statute be directory or mandatory, the argument in this case is not affected thereby, for—

It is well established that while mere neglect to perform directory requirements of the law, or performance in a mistaken manner, when there is no bad faith and no harm has accrued, will not justify the rejection of an entire poll, it is equally well settled that where the proceedings are so tarnished by fraudulent or negligent or improper conduct on the part of the officers as that the result of the election is rendered unreliable, the entire poll will be rejected, and the parties left to make such proof as they may of votes legally cast for them. (Covode vs. Foster, 2 Bartlett, 600.)

The certified return from this precinct gives to Mr. Romeis 220 majority. But the contestant has successfully impeached the return, which is proved and conceded to be false if not fraudulent. The only evidence to show how many votes were cast and for whom at this precinct is the return itself. Two judges and one clerk were examined and testified, but they did not attempt and were not asked to prove any facts relating to the election independently of the return. The contestee, advisedly, it must be presumed, as he had the benefit of learned counsel, did not offer any evidence to prove that he had a legal majority in the precinct. Why not? Probably because he could not. The prima facie character of the return having been destroyed, Mr. Romeis knew that the laboring oar had shifted, and that the onus was upon him to prove the true number of votes which he had received. It would seem that if he could have explained satisfactorily the irregularities and corrupt practices which are alleged to have prevailed in that precinct at that election he would have been only too glad to do so. The contestee has acted deliberately with his eyes wide open; and, having taken the risk, he must abide the consequences. In my humble judgment no member of this House, with the lights before him—unless he is determined to close his eyes and ears to the truth and neither read the evidence nor listen to the arguments in this case—can fail to reach the conclusion that the entire poll of this precinct should be rejected.

The next precinct to be considered is Kelley's Island. The vote there was 126 for Romeis and 97 for Hurd; majority for Romeis, 29. At the last preceding general election in October, 1883, the precinct had gone Democratic by 55 majority. On this island Norman Kelley, who was engaged in "grape-growing" and "stone-quarrying," had in his employment about seventy men, or nearly one-third of the voters of the precinct. Mr. Kelley had not been generally active in politics at preceding elections; but this time he was thoroughly enlisted—electioneered earnestly with his men before and on the day of the election. He permitted his zeal to outrun his discretion, and there can be no doubt used his position as an employer of labor in a very offensive and unjustifiable manner. He boldly, but insidiously, threatened to discharge those of his men who would not "vote or work for his interests." He said "he did not consider this intimidation, but that it was a matter of business with him, and he had to protect his own interests." He admits himself that he told his men "he would naturally expect to retain those who voted for his interest," which he also informed them was "their own." It was very unusual for Norman Kelley to be seen at the polls; but on this day he was there in the afternoon before his men went up to vote. He stood at the door of the hall or room where the election was held, and as his men went in to vote told them "he would like to see their tickets." He did not seem to care "so they voted against Hurd." He worked very hard with his own men, industriously electioneering with them in the very room where the voting was going on. He spoke to several (four or five) whom he could not influence as each one retired after voting: "You will be one of the first ones that will have to go." This was said inside the hall, in the presence of everybody, so that all his men could hear it.

This testimony shows, beyond all peradventure, that Norman Kelley (1) intended to intimidate his employés, if possible; (2) made his men generally and fully acquainted with his intention; (3) carried his intention and purpose into effect by his presence, talk, and conduct at the polls on the day of election.

Now, what is the rule in such cases? The minority report, prepared by ex-Speaker Keifer, in the case of Donnelly vs. Washburn, states it correctly; and "undoubtedly," as Mr. Keifer says, "when bribery, fraud, or intimidation is so interwoven with the vote of any voting precinct that it can not be eliminated with certainty from the aggregate vote cast, the whole vote of the precinct may and perhaps should be rejected."

I also quote from Cunningham on Elections, page 184:

The true rule is: when the law has been violated, and outrage and intimidation organized, the onus is on the respondent of showing that that outrage and intimidation have not produced their natural consequences, namely, terrifying the people from exercising their franchise.

In the Drogheda case it is said:

But who is there would venture to gauge the influence of intimidation? Who will say how far that reaches? Who will be able to tell what the effect of intimidation is upon the human mind? (Brickwood & Craft's Election Manual, page 215.)

Listen also to Mr. Justice Keogh, in the same case:

The humblest individual, in this broad land of ours, has as good a right, without fear or intimidation, to go to the court-house, on the day of election, as the richest man upon the register, and as good a right as the great majority of the community.

The presumption therefore always is that intimidation, when resorted to, has produced its intended results. The workingmen and the wage-earners in this country look to this House—which is supposed to reflect truly the will of the free and unbought suffrages of the American people—to protect them from the insolent threats, intimidation, and violence of those persons from whom they are compelled to seek employment. As a rule, American employers of labor—to their honor be it said—do not attempt to interfere with the free exercise of the right of suffrage by their workmen. And the factory owner or other employer who dares attempt to interfere with this, one of the dearest rights of every freeman, should be held up to the scorn, derision, and contempt of the whole civilized world, and should be punished to the utmost extent of the law.

The entire poll of the precinct at Kelley's Island should be rejected.

Without proceeding further, if I am right thus far Mr. Hurd's majority is 10 votes over Mr. Romeis's.

Precinct C, ward 3, of the city of Toledo, is almost in as bad condition as Precinct B. Mr. Romeis received there 319 votes and Mr. Hurd 153; majority for Romeis, 166. David Emerick, clerk of the election, testifies, pages 11, 137:

Answer to question 8. Mr. Kirk unlocked the ticket-box and threw probably one hundred and fifty or one hundred and seventy-five tickets on the table, and the judges proceeded to open up and assort them * * * by piling the straight Republican tickets on one pile, the scratched Republican tickets on another pile; the straight Democratic tickets on one pile, and the scratched Democratic tickets on another pile, &c.

Answer to question 12. I think Mr. Kirk took out about one hundred and seventy-five or two hundred, and Mr. Bell threw the balance of the tickets on the table.

The illegal interference by Bell with the ballots certainly occurred at the October election. There is absolutely no reasonable doubt about that. The law regulating the count was also deliberately violated. Every opportunity was afforded the election officers and the bystanders for the fraudulent counting, abstraction, displacement, and substitution of the ballots. The law having been deliberately violated, and the burden of proof having been shifted to the contestee to show that the irregularities committed and the departures from the law were innocent and unintended, and he having failed to show by any evidence offered a satisfactory explanation of these violations of the law, it is my opinion that the vote of the precinct should be thrown out.

It is not necessary, and I have no time to argue the case at any greater length. I have considered the questions involved in all their bearings, and after a patient and exhaustive examination of the evidence and of the law bearing thereon, I see no loophole of escape from the conclusion that Frank H. Hurd was duly elected a member of this House from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio, and that Jacob Romeis was not.

At the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, he asked and obtained leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible within the limits of ten minutes to attempt to discuss the issues involved in this case, and I shall not therefore try to go over the mass of evidence here presented, but what I have to say will be confined to one or two points merely.

The presentation of this contest in this Congress is an illustration of the general belief that any one of the majority party, for the time being, desiring to contest the election of his opponent has only to furnish a plausible excuse for the contest, after which his party friends, without reference to the right of the matter, will vote him into the seat.

I repeat, the presentation of this case in Congress is but another illustration of that general belief; for I undertake to say that there is not a lawyer in this Congress who would risk his professional reputation in advising any client to present such a case in any respectable court. Outside of this House and outside of any feeling of partisanship, and I think I know what I say to be true, no respectable lawyer who respects his reputation would advise the presentation of this evidence in any respectable court.

This contest turns absolutely upon Precinct B of the eighth ward of the city of Toledo. Without that goes out in whole, there is not anything left in the claim of the contestant that would overcome the announced majority for contestee. That ward is sought to be thrown out under a charge that corruption was used in the ward; and the strange proposition is announced here that bribery or corruption need not be proven, but it is sufficient that they may be suspected, and the party may be deprived of his seat on a mere suspicion.

The sole testimony which has been presented, attempting to prove this allegation of bribery, comes from a man named Gerstmann, a man who scarcely told a single truth—as illustrated by his answers on cross-examination—during his whole testimony; and not having an intelligent understanding of what was testimony, he did not succeed in telling even an able-bodied lie. [Laughter.] I undertake to say that no man in this House, if sitting upon the bench, would permit to go to the jury a particle of the testimony which was sworn to by that man bearing upon the question of corruption. He attempted to testify as an expert upon the question of whether voters had been influenced by such means. He went to Toledo, he did not know what portion of the city or what ward; he talked to somebody, he does not know who; and he expressed the opinion that the people with whom he talked were in favor of Mr. Hurd's election. He expressed a mere opinion; there is not a fact testified to on which to base it, no name is given, no parties are mentioned, no statement of who or what they were, or to what party they belonged. Subsequently he said he went to that ward and found the sentiment was changed a good deal, that by the looks in their countenances they had been corrupted. He testifies as an expert judge of facial expression. He did not testify that the people he saw the second time were the people he saw the first time.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOWDEN. Was it not possible for him to have detected it if they had been corrupted through fear?

Mr. ROWELL. Almost anything was possible for this man who nineteen times refused to answer when pertinent questions were asked touching his credibility; who seventeen times refused to remember when the questions were bringing him into contact with some name; only once he ventured to mention a name, and he was promptly contradicted by a respectable witness.

He said when he went back the second time he found the feeling of the voters changed. On cross-examination it turns out when he went back that time he went to his Democratic friend, the only man he knew in the city, visited the Democratic central committee-man, then went away and did not go round among the voters; that the time he discovered by the looks of the countenances that the vote was changed was a week after his first visit, before he went to New York; three or four weeks before he had reported to anybody, if he is to be believed.

And this calls out the opinion that in law you do not need to prove corruption and fraud, but that when you bring a witness to express such an opinion from the looks of people that they have changed their political relations that is sufficient.

This eminently respectable citizen of Saint Joe, who refused to tell where he lived, this eminently respectable man swears he does not know any way of changing votes except by buying them. Now if that were true we had better quit making stump speeches, we had better quit circulating compaign literature. And if it is true that Mr. Hurd is to be seated upon that theory, it is an announcement on the part of his party friends that the only way they ever expect to convert people in that district to Mr. Hurd's views is to buy them up, because there is no way of reaching their intelligence.

I say the whole thing is based on the senseless talk of a traveling, Polish, self-elected rabbi, who does not dare to tell of his past life or where he has been, but crosses his track whenever cross-examined, refuses to have his knowledge put to the test by mentioning anybody, and when he once carelessly mentions a name is promptly proved to be a liar.

And I undertake to assert there is no man on either side of the House, even my friend from Missouri, who represents the eminently respectable people of Saint Joseph, who, if he will read the record, will not say if Mr. Hurd could not get a better lie than this he had better leave it out entirely.

But believe every word he says, and he proves nothing. He swears to nothing. He testifies to no fact, and he testifies about a ward and a precinct in the city of Toledo that had three times before this given like majorities to the contestee in this case and did not need to have its vote changed either by argument or by corruption.

Then it is said that there were some ticket peddlers hired. Well, I do not know whether there were or not; but there is not a particle of evidence in this record that there was a ticket peddler hired. A man swears he was told there were some ticket peddlers hired. If that is legitimate evidence in a contested-election case before the House of Representatives, it is about time we learned something about the laws of evidence.

Again, it is said that during the count of the vote once or twice the clerks called a halt to correct their tallies. Did anybody ever sit in a voting-room and see the votes counted that did not frequently see the clerks call a halt when one man would get the tally one side or the other? And because that is true, is this vote to be thrown out? They say they did not follow the technical law. Ah, gentlemen, are you going to disfranchise 430 legal voters because the judges of election, in a matter of pure discretion, do not follow the literal letter of the law, provided they get at the exact fact—because they turned the ballots out and counted them unopened?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ROWELL resumed his seat amidst applause.

Mr. TURNER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 14, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR JACKSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from Hon. HOWELL E. JACKSON, notifying the Senate that having accepted the office of circuit judge of the United States, his office of United States Senator becomes vacant. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the letter, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C., April 14, 1886.

SIR: I have this day accepted the office of circuit judge of the United States for the sixth judicial circuit, and in consequence thereof my office of United States Senator for the State of Tennessee has become vacant.

Will you be kind enough to inform the executive of Tennessee (Hon. W. B. Bate) of this fact?

Very truly and respectfully, yours,

HOWELL E. JACKSON.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will lie on the table; and notice will be given according to the request, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents certain resolutions adopted by the national convention of wool-growers recently assembled in Saint Louis, in which they complain of the proposed action in respect to placing wool on the free-list, and set out in some detail the grounds of their opposition and objection to the proposed action. If there be no objection these resolutions will be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a memorial of merchants of New York city and Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of a bankruptcy law. I present this memorial with a great deal of satisfaction, because, so far as I know, heretofore the merchants of the great cities of this country have arrayed themselves against the country merchants in favor of a bankruptcy law, and I am glad to have this evidence of returning sense on their part. I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition of the Frontier Guards, an organization which was created in Washington during the early period of the war of 1861, for the purpose of meeting the emergencies then upon the Government, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the issue of discharges to certain members of that body. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Concordia, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of certain organizations of wage-workers in the United States, praying for the unlimited coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER presented a petition of 62 citizens of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory; resolutions of a mass-meeting of citizens of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory; a communication of two members of the board of county commissioners of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory; a petition of 64 citizens of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory; a petition of 11 citizens of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory; resolutions of a mass-meeting of citizens of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory; a statement of members of the grand jury of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory, and a petition of citizens of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory, praying for the passage of House bill 2889 annexing North Idaho to Washington Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. EVARTS presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Ogdensburg, Oxford, and Allentown, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Nashua, N. H., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the New Hampshire State boarp of health, favoring the establishment of a national health department, and indorsing the bill preventing the introduction of contagious and infectious diseases into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Roswell, Ga., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FAIR presented a memorial of cattle-owners of Nevada, remonstrating against some of the provisions of Senate bill 1715 to regulate the transportation of live stock; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of citizens of Franklin County, New York, praying for the right to take grain across the Canadian frontier to be ground and to bring back the flour, &c., without the payment of duties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Syracuse, N. Y., praying that liberal appropriations be made for internal improvement and the construction of a harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, Rockport, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Allentown and Syracuse, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I present a letter in the nature of a petition from J. W. Hagan, of Sumterville, Sumter County, Florida, in relation to the homestead law and oppressive action in the administration of the same in the State of Florida in reference to homesteads, and he petitions suggesting the necessity for a modification in regard to it. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

The paper is as follows:

SUMTERVILLE, FLA., April 5, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Yours of 21st March, 1886, received, and am glad to say that your favorable and very kind offer is duly appreciated. The case as referred to is as follows: That the F., R. & N. Railroad passed through my homestead a distance of 1 mile, and my cabin was in the right of way. I gave permission for it to be moved out. My house was moved out, and shortly afterward burned down, with my carpenter tools and my effects, and one John Bailey then entered upon my homestead and cut cross-ties; 1,100 or 1,200, and I forbid him trespass as soon as I found out he was on my land. He continued; I notified the United States Land Office of the fact. To my appeal Mr. Coffman came down. Now, Mr. Coffman asked me to furnish him with a vehicle and team to investigate all this trespass, which I did at my own expense. He counted the ties; saw Mr. Bailey; told me that he had compromised the matter, and that he would send me the voucher for my timber at 8½ cents apiece for the ties. After he had looked at my place he offered to commute the land or to pay it and for one-half, to wit, 80 acres of the 160. I refused this offer. This was in September, 1883, and April, 1884, I received a summon requiring me to appear at Gainesville, Fla., in May, to answer, with witnesses, a suit of contest instituted by the United States Government and the F., R. & N. Railroad. Mr. Coffman, my friendly agent, and a Mr. Ham, an attorney, complainants, Mr. Coffman representing the United States Government, and Mr. Ham the railroad. I appeared with witnesses in defense as defendant, and as Mr. Coffman constituted the court, was complainant and witness, he forced me to defend my case before he complained as he should have done as plaintiff. His witnesses were picked up at Jacksonville. Not one of them lives or did live in Sumter County, where I live. My witnesses lived in my immediate neighborhood, not more than 2 miles distant. They are here to-day, good citizens; one of them has been a justice of the peace since 1877. Now, his (Mr. Coffman's) witnesses are transient men, and there is but one of them in the State at this time. Therefore they forced me to offer my evidence first, so that he could deny the same.

Mr. Coffman had the sheriff subpœnaed, and then refused to let him testify, as he did not seem to cater to his wishes. He did, however, make his statement, at my request. The trial was ex parte in toto; and, further, Mr. Horn publicly confessed that he himself or Mr. Coffman did not desire to deprive me of my house or homestead, but that it was necessary to do so to save the railroad from having to pay for the damage done by Mr. Bailey; and to further protect the railroad from damage one Mr. Renfroe, who was then president of the Gainesville College, had filed a contest against the land. This man is now in Colorado, so I am informed. And to further show their intentions, the acting clerk, Mr. Webster, and Mr. Coffman both resigned the same week they put up this job. Now, if this statement merits your further thought, you will find all the evidence in the case. Will be found with Messrs. Drummond & Bradford, Washington, D. C. There has been some additional evidence sent up since the trial, which you will also find. Hoping that you will understand the case, and will give the same a small part of your valuable time, for which you shall be fully rewarded, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

S. P. GREEN.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

Col. W. CALL: I have read the above letter, and I was also a witness in the case. As far as I know, the statement is correct. I was present on the trial. I never saw a more unfair trial carried on. You see Mr. Green states that Mr. Coffman was court, complainant, and all; this was true. He dictated every word that was put down on his side, and objected to most every important point offered against him. He told me before the case was called that the case was decided against Mr. Green already, and all that he wanted to do was to carry it through a form. This I am ready to testify at any time.

I am, yours, very respectfully,

J. W. HAGAN.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Moline, Ill., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Bloomington, Streaton, Pekin, and Lincoln, in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Ravenwood, Ill., and a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction in the District of Columbia; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to prevent the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Tariffville, Conn., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a memorial of 26 shippers, producers, and commission handlers of live cattle, of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1715) to regulate the transportation of live-stock; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. 203) for the relief of Cyprian T. Jenkins; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Perez Dickinson, of Knoxville, Tenn., surviving partner of Cowan & Dickinson, praying that an appropriation be made to pay him for cotton furnished and delivered to General Burnside at Knoxville, Tenn., in accordance with the findings of the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1171) for the relief of the heirs of John Byrns, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 619) granting a pension to Robert F. H. Goode;
A bill (H. R. 737) granting a pension to N. M. Miller;
A bill (H. R. 837) granting a pension to Edgar Payne;
A bill (H. R. 3902) for the relief of Susannah Carmichael;
A bill (H. R. 3364) granting a pension to Asahel Middleton;
A bill (H. R. 3539) granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah M. Chapman;
A bill (H. R. 3524) granting a pension to Maria Mibord;
A bill (H. R. 1711) for the relief of George C. Haynie;
A bill (H. R. 3505) for the relief of Mary B. Smith;
A bill (H. R. 1703) granting a pension to Joseph Williams;
A bill (H. R. 3419) granting a pension to C. W. I. Pugh;
A bill (H. R. 3903) granting a pension to Taylor Voss;
A bill (H. R. 1824) granting a pension to Mrs. Louisa Noland;
A bill (S. 788) granting a pension to John L. Bruce.
A bill (S. 963) granting a pension to Harriet M. Rider;
A bill (S. 1169) granting a pension to John S. Bridges;
A bill (S. 1113) granting a pension to Lawrence A. Hudson;
A bill (S. 1420) granting a pension to William Powell; and

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1192) granting a pension to Alfred Denny, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1190) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin Fisher; and
A bill (S. 1441) granting a pension to M. Romahr.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2134), granting a pension to Patrick A. Callanan; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 895) granting a pension to Rachel Fleming Cellar, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 233) granting a pension to Christiana Cooley, to report adversely thereon. The claimant since the papers were filed has received a pension at the Department. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 897) for the relief of John Kouns, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4411) for the relief of A. Gates Lee, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1256) for the relief of Thomas H. Norton and James McLean, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAIR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1963) to compensate Isaiah W. Lees and H. H. Ellis, of San Francisco, for services rendered the Government, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2135), to compensate Isaiah W. Lees and H. H. Ellis, of San Francisco, for services rendered the Government; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1876) for the relief of Piromis H. Bell, administrator of Marcus A. Bell, deceased, and others, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1464) for the relief of David Webster, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 392) for the relief of Edward Fenlon, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to; and he submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2136), for the relief of Edward Fenlon; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 502) for the relief of J. M. English, administrator of the estate of Richard Fitzpatrick, deceased, to report it adversely. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 586) for the relief of William H. Wymore, as administrator of the estate of Carey Nall, deceased, to submit an adverse report thereon, and ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 410) for the relief of J. A. Hodges, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

CHESAPEAKE BAY LIGHT-SHIP.

Mr. GORMAN. From the Committee on Commerce I report favorably the bill (H. R. 7632) to establish a light-ship off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay. As there is very great importance that this bill should be passed and the appropriation made, I ask unanimous consent to have it considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be constructed and established a first-class light-ship, with a steam fog-signal, off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay, the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $60,000: Provided, That the construction of said light-ship shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder after advertisement, and that said light-ship shall be built in American ship-yards.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. Is there a report accompanying the bill showing the necessity of this proposed light-ship?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. GORMAN. I will state to the Senator from New Jersey that there is a House report on the subject, in which the Light-House Board recommend the appropriation for this purpose as being absolutely necessary.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CLARDY in the House of Representatives April 6, 1886:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6076) providing for the establishment of a light-ship and fog-signal at the entrance to Chesapeake Bay, beg leave to report that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute, which has the approval of the Light-House Board, as is shown by the communications of S. C. Rowan, vice-admiral United States Navy, and chairman of said board, to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, under dates March 20, 1886, and April 3, and which are hereto appended.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, March 20, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated March 5, 1886, transmitting for its views two House bills, one of which was bill No. 6076, appropriating $60,000 to construct and establish a first-class light-ship with a steam fog-signal off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay.

In reply the board begs leave to say that this matter came up for consideration at its session on March 17, 1886, when the conclusion was reached that a light-ship so placed would be a valuable aid to navigation, and the board has the honor to recommend that the proper steps be taken for its establishment.

A copy of the letter of the Committee on Commerce and of H. R. bill 6076 are inclosed.

Very respectfully,

HENRY F. PICKING,
Commander, U. S. Navy, Naval Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, April 3, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to again refer to a letter from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated March 5, 1886, transmitting for its views two House bills, one of which was bill No. 6076, appropriating $60,000 to construct and establish a first-class light-ship with a steam fog-signal off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay.

In further reply the board begs leave to say that an attempt has been made from time to time to make this entrance by lighted and whistling buoys, but without much success, as the lights have gone out and the buoys have been carried away from their positions, so that they have afforded little, if any, real aid to mariners.

The board feels that it is very important to have a light-ship at that point, as the quantity of commerce passing between Capes Henry and Charles is immense, being all the shipping that is making for Baltimore, Richmond, Norfolk, the new harbor of Newport News, and all the tributaries to Chesapeake Bay, as well as that which seeks Hampton Roads as a harbor of refuge.

Now that Newport News has become the terminus of a great railroad system, and that new and important railroad connections have been made at Norfolk and vicinity, this commerce is much greater than ever before, and the most approved and best methods of security should be given it.

A copy of the above-mentioned letter from the Committee on Commerce and of House bill No. 6076 are herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully,

S. C. ROWAN,
Vice-Admiral, U. S. Navy, Chairman.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WHARTON'S DIGEST OF INTERNATIONAL DECISIONS.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up from the Calendar the joint resolution (S. R. 58) providing for the purchase and distribution of 4,000 copies of a Digest of International Decisions of the United States, edited by Francis Wharton.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order to consider the joint resolution except by unanimous consent. The Senator from New York asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up for present consideration the joint resolution indicated by him. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The attention of the Chair is called to a formal amendment in line 8, where the word "dollars" is printed for "copies." That correction will be made. There are amendments proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 8, after the word "copies," insert:

For use in the committee-rooms of the Senate, 100 copies, and of the House of Representatives, 100 copies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 10, after the word "thousand," to insert "two hundred;" so as to read, "in all, 4,200 copies."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the joint resolution be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be purchased, for distribution among the members of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies of a Digest of International Decisions of the United States, edited by Francis Wharton; for distribution among the members of the Senate, 1,000 copies; for the use of the Department of State, 1,000 copies; for use in the committee-rooms of the Senate, 100 copies, and of the House of Representatives, 100 copies; in all, 4,200 copies; said Digest to be paid for at a uniform price per volume to be fixed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, acting concurrently.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the joint resolution by striking out all that part which refers to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and inserting "the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses."

Mr. EVARTS. If the Senator will allow me I will state that the joint resolution and the book have no connection with the public printing. This is a book prepared and edited and to be published by the editor, and the application is for the appropriation of so much as may be required for the purchase of a certain number of volumes of the book. It is not connected with the subject of public printing at all.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that before we commit ourselves to the purchase of a book which is of course practically a private enterprise we ought to know something about it. I think myself that the cost of setting the type and furnishing the paper and doing the press-work and the binding, &c., is at least a guide to the value of the book. Of course there is to be added besides the headwork necessary to prepare it. But I should not like to depart, as far as I am concerned, from the usual rule which we have adopted about submitting these matters to the judgment of the committee which has them specially in charge, and especially as where that thing has been done heretofore it has resulted in giving, I think, a rather unusual price. It seems to me that we ought to say what the price is, or else we ought to submit it to some competent committee to ascertain. I presume it is known exactly as well now what the price will be as it will be later; but whether it be or not, either the price should be named or it should go to some committee such as has charge of similar subjects under the rules of the Senate and the House.

Mr. EVARTS. I will say in reply to the suggestions of the Senator from Kansas that the book is not now completed and ready for delivery, certainly not for purchase. The suggestion that the Committee on Printing might be wise guides to the chairmen of the Foreign Committees of the House and the Senate is undoubtedly a proper suggestion; but nevertheless the criterion of the value of a published book of this nature, if the Government thinks it of public service so that it should be purchased for the use of the Government, has usually been left to the Secretary of State or to some committees who had charge of the subject-matter treated of in the book. Mr. Bayard would assume that responsibility if it were desired, but his preference was that it should be fixed by the two Houses acting in this way by the two committees that had relation to the subject-matter of the work.

I will say in regard to the work that I think the title will commend itself to every one as a book that, if competently prepared and edited and printed, every one would desire to have possession of and have the means of widely distributing for the use of the public service. The title is "A Digest of the International Law of the United States, taken from the Opinions of Presidents, and Secretaries of State, and of Attorneys-General; and from the Decisions of Federal Courts, and of Joint International Commissions in which the United States was a Party. Edited by Francis Wharton." The only amendment proposed in the Foreign Relations Committee was an addition of 200 copies to the number named in the joint resolution as introduced, specifically applying 100 for the committee-rooms of this body and 100 for the committee-rooms of the House of Representatives.

This relates to the purchase of a book prepared by an editor and printed under his charge; at least there is accorded to the author and publisher full control, and the question is whether we think it worth while for us to purchase the work. The work itself is commended highly by every one, and I perhaps do not add much to the general knowledge concerning Mr. Wharton, the editor, from the personal acquaintance that I have long had with this gentleman and an acquaintance with his public works as an editor, as a jurisconsult, and as a publicist; and I imagine that all who have given attention to this subject would be gladly put in possession of this work as promptly as possible. I hope the joint resolution will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York to a section of the statutes and ask him whether the Committee on Foreign Relations has considered this statute in reference to this resolution? As I heard the resolution read, it provides that 1,000 copies of this publication shall be purchased for distribution among members of the Senate and 2,000 among members of the House of Representatives. I call his attention to section 42 of chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 42. When any book is ordered to and received by any Member or Delegate, by a resolution of either or both Houses of Congress, the price paid for the same shall be deducted from the compensation of such Member or Delegate; except books ordered to be printed by the Congressional Printer during the Congress for which the Member or Delegate was elected.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yesterday I was informed by the Chair that under Rule VIII all motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter should be determined without debate. I moved to take from the table a resolution, and then when the proposition was taken from the table and debate ensued the Chair ruled that under Rule VIII no debate could occur. Now I am not willing to have propositions pending before the Senate looking to the opening of the doors in executive session, as it is now called, subrogated to a proposition to print anybody's law reports. We have got so many law reports now that no lawyer can do more than consult a quota of the volumes. I make the point of order, not for the purpose of cutting off debate, but to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is a rule here for the government of all Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is bound to overrule the point of order made by the Senator from Virginia because the Senate by unanimous consent——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That was to take up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate agreed to take up and consider the joint resolution now before the Senate. The Senator from Virginia concurred in the unanimous consent, and the Senate thereby waived the rule so far as the consideration of this joint resolution is concerned. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] has the floor.

Mr. MANDERSON. I presumed I was speaking to the question itself, and not as to the advisability of taking up the resolution. I do not know whether this section of the Revised Statutes has been considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations; but it seems to me that we might find ourselves in this predicament: We shall have 3,000 volumes of this work, unquestionably a valuable one, ordered for members of Congress when the members will not be willing to pay the cost price.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I fail to understand the remarks of the Senator from New York who spoke upon this subject. The Senator from Kansas I understood propounded the inquiry what this book would probably cost, and I supposed the Senator from New York was addressing himself to that interrogation, but from the noise in the Hall it was impossible for me to hear his answer to it. I should like to know the probable cost of this work; but before that let me ask how many copies in all are to be ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Four thousand two hundred. The pending amendment will be read.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I should like to make some inquiries after the amendment is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 12, after the word "by," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "concurrently," in line 15, as follows:

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, acting concurrently.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

The Joint Committee on Printing of the Senate and House of Representatives.

So as to read:

Said Digest to be paid for at a uniform price per volume to be fixed by the Joint Committtee on Printing of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Do I understand that this book is not yet printed? Is it in type?

Mr. EVARTS. No.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then why not direct it to be printed at the Government Printing Office, if it is to be a document to the extent of 4,200 copies?

Mr. EVARTS. It is not a document at all.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I presume the purpose is to make it a document for distribution, as I understand the resolution.

Mr. EVARTS. What the United States purchases will be at its disposition for distribution. The proposition is to buy a certain number of copies.

Mr. VAN WYCK. To that extent it will be a document.

Mr. EVARTS. It will be the possession of the United States after the copies are bought. There are various instances of books of that kind. This is not the product of the public action of the United States; it is not a publication by the United States of its own papers; it is a book edited by a competent and useful editor of a very useful and valuable book. The question proposed to us is whether we should become the purchasers of a certain number of copies for public use in the manner proposed. That is the nature of the proceeding.

Now, Mr. President, it is not of much importance that I can see whether the chairmen of the two Committees on Printing of the two Houses are consulted or are associated in this purchase; but perhaps it might be well enough if it is thought important, as the Senator from Kansas seems to think it is, that the Printing Committee should have some share in fixing and estimating the value of the purchase, to add "and the chairmen of the Committees on Foreign Relations and the chairmen of the two Printing Committees." I ask the Senator from Kanses to consider my suggestion that the chairmen of the Committees on Printing be associated with the chairmen of the Committees on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that when we come to provide for these books, if we shall do so, we put in the price for the number of volumes we propose to buy. We are doing a very unusual thing. While I am not saying or designing to intimate that this responsibility will not be wisely exercised, it is departing from the usual legislative custom to put a responsibility of this kind, which we can exercise ourselves, in the hands of somebody else. I would suggest, therefore, to the Senator from New York, if he is not now prepared to fix a maximum price for these volumes, that he let this resolution lie over until such time as he can come here and say that a certain price will amply compensate the editor and publisher, and put that in as a limitation on the discretion of the Committee on Printing or whatever other body of men we submit the question of purchase to.

As far as I am concerned, while I have not any doubt about the value of the purchase, at least to the extent named, still we ought to observe as far as we possibly can, I think, the essential precautions that are usually observed in matters of this kind.

While I am up, I will say that this will not be a public document. I venture to say there are not half a dozen members of both Houses of Congress who will care to distribute it to the extent of paying the postage. Now and then of course some attorney would like to have it, but it will not be in any considerable demand, and it can not be sent through the mail as a public document, it not being printed at the Government Printing Office, but being purchased. It seems to me it ought not to be published for a distribution which will not take place. But apart from that, it seems to me that in the first place we ought to determine what the book is going to cost.

Mr. EVARTS. It is certainly very advisable that at a proper stage of proceedings there should be a proper ascertainment of the value of the book that as a purchaser the United States should engage to take; and as the representatives of the United States are by the editor and the proposed publisher made the sole judges as to the price that they will pay, it does not seem to me that any complaint can be made of any undue charge by the publisher or the editor. It is submitted to the United States, represented in the two Houses by their respective committees on the subject, to determine what is a fair price for this book. Somebody must determine that price. I will agree that these chairmen ought to consult the Public Printer or the Printing Committees as to what should be a guide; and I am quite willing to add to this resolution the chairmen of these two Printing Committees. How otherwise you can determine as between buyer and seller the price that the buyer should be willing to give than by this ascertainment by competent judges and experts on his part to determine it, I can not for my life see.

This book is a work that, if left only to private patronage, would probably be put to the purchasers and to a fewer number of purchasers, at a larger price than if the Government becomes a purchaser of a certain number of volumes. It belongs to that class of publications which are mainly and principally for the use of the public service in the elucidation and exposition of the line of diplomatic and state papers that instruct us in this and that topic as it comes up for debate. And while I have every desire that nothing should be done in the way of fixing a price that is injurious or excessive, I know of no mode of fixing that price better than by that here proposed. Nor can I think that the publisher or the editor can be complained of if they leave it to the buying side of the contract entirely, for the buying party to determine it.

The book is very nearly ready to go to press; and the Department of State and the Foreign Relations Committees of both Houses are disposed to think that the sooner it is in possession of the public and of Congress the better. With that view we have promptly and unanimously reported this resolution adding only 200 copies; and I should hope that with entire unanimity we might dispose of this question with proper guards as to the protection of the public interest.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from New York how many volumes there will probably be of this work?

Mr. EVARTS. Two volumes, as I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. And does it comprise the correspondence, state papers, &c., of the State Department, and the decisions of the courts of the United States, and acts of Congress?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. Is the morning business through?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind Senators that the morning business has been interrupted.

Mr. BUTLER. I was under the impression that the morning business was through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not yet. The order stands at reports of committees. This joint resolution was taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOGAN. Was this resolution reported to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it is pending by unanimous consent.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object if it is proceeding by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate having given its consent to take up the resolution, it must be proceeded with.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. But I did not consent to debate. To take up a bill is one thing, and to debate it is another. That was the way the Chair ruled yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution was taken up by order of the Senate, and is open to debate.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire simply by way of suggestion to say a word in reference to this resolution.

I do not know that I desire it to be considered from what I shall say that I shall oppose the purchase of this valuable work if it shall turn out to be so, but I wish to suggest to the Senator from New York that this resolution is certainly an unusual one in reference to the purchase of books. It does seem to me that this book when prepared ought to be submitted, if the Congress of the United States is to become a purchaser, to a competent committee for the examination of its contents. If they shall report to Congress that it is a work of great value and would be so esteemed by men who desire to examine into the subjects to which it relates, on a report of that character doubtless Congress would purchase the book, or at least a certain number of copies. But to agree to the resolution to purchase 2,000 volumes for the House and 1,000 for the Senate and 1,000 for the State Department, comprising two volumes, without any fixed price, does seem to me as rather an extraordinary proceeding.

I merely suggest that I think the resolution ought to lie over or go back to the committee, and let there be a proposition offered here for the examination of this work. No matter how competent this author may be, yet it will not do to take a book on trust and say that because he is a competent man therefore the book is going to be of great value. Sometimes people are imposed upon, not intentionally, by an author, but by mistake as to the value of the property he tenders or the writings that he may prepare. So it might be in this case. This man is a competent man, doubtless. He is certainly a pretty good authority on this particular question; there is no doubt about that. I admit that proposition; but at the same time, for safety, I do think that acting on the part of the people as a Congress we ought to take the steps which would make it safe and secure. It is not safe to act without an examination of the work, to see what the character of the work is and what its probable value may be to the people.

I make that suggestion to the Senator because, as I said, I do not wish to commit myself against this proposition, for doubtless it will be a valuable work. I have no doubt of that, but at the same time I do not wish to vote blindly for a resolution to purchase so many volumes of a book unknown except by mere extracts that we have from it. And it being a digest, which means a mere compilation of the opinions of courts and those high in authority in reference to foreign relations—it being of that character, I would rather see the work myself, or at least I would rather have some competent committee see it before purchasing it, than to take a leap in the dark and say that we will purchase so many volumes without fixing the price.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether it is expected to compensate Mr. Wharton for his labors as editor in part in the price of the book, or whether those labors are rendered as a part of his official services as Assistant Secretary of State, or whatever the office he now holds; that is, whether we are to pay only for the mechanical execution of the book and the material, or for the editing.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. Wharton is a very competent editor of such a work we shall all agree, I imagine, who are acquainted with him either by personal knowledge or by repute; and others can inform themselves as to the general relation of the subject. I do not understand my friend the Senator from Illinois to raise any objection to the competency of his editorship.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. EVARTS. He will be in a position, if he publishes it on his own account, to fix the price at which it shall be sold in the market. Whether the production of such a work as this would warrant an expectation by the editor of an adequate amount of general patronage in the market to make the return what it should be in all respects may of course be doubted. Perhaps a conclusion might be that it would not be a venture on publishing that would be recommended. The United States is then asked at this stage of matters, when the work is substantially ready to go to the printer, to say whether it will become a patron in the market, or the purchaser of this book to the extent of a certain number of copies at such price as we may fix. That is the whole transaction as one of dealing concerning the book.

So too in regard to such consideration or approval as has already been given to the subject by the Foreign Relations Committees, if the House committee should report as they are expecting to do, I believe, a similar resolution on that committee's approval of the work, then it stands that the two Houses through their Committees on Foreign Relations have approved of the work, so that we of the committee, without dissent on the subject, have been satisfied that the work itself in its project and in its frame is valuable, that the various selected specimens which are furnished us are in accord with what should form the matter of such a book. Then the committee having access if they desire it to the bulk of the work as now ready to go to print can make further examination. Recommendations were presented from the Secretary of State and from some eminent public authorities—on such subjects, I mean, not official—and these, together with the inspection which we gave to the subject and to the specimens and to the frame and purpose, satisfied us that it was a useful book.

Now in regard to the question made by the Senator from Massachusetts, I can only say that the editor, as I understand, would be the proprietor, with the publisher, of the book after it shall have been published; and if the United States does not purchase it in any way, the United States is not a party at all to the question of the value and salable price of the book. The United States in determining (which is wholly confided to them) the price they will put upon it have a right to regard the matter suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts as to the work proceeding out of material that is furnished by the Government itself.

I am willing that this should stand over, Mr. President, in order that we may ascertain whether it is supposed that a larger exposition of the nature of the book or a nearer ascertainment of the probable cost of the book may be reached, for I have not the least desire that this should be prosecuted except wholly in the public interest.

Mr. MANDERSON. As this matter I understand is to go over on the suggestion of the Sentor from New York, I simply desire——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to lay it on the table?

Mr. EVARTS. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. MANDERSON. By unanimous consent I desire to make a suggestion in reference to the resolution.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not consent. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York having moved to lay this matter on the table, the question is not debatable.

Mr. EVARTS. I will recall the motion for the purpose of hearing the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The motion can not be withdrawn after objection is made. The objection has not been withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that when a motion to lay on the table is pending no debate can follow; an objection being interposed by the Senator from Virginia, no debate is now in order. The only question is shall the joint resolution lie on the table? The question is on that motion.

Mr. EVARTS. I withdrew my motion for the purpose of hearing the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOAR. Do not the rules expressly provide that a motion may be withdrawn before the yeas and nays are ordered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But objection had been interposed before that proposition was made.

Mr. HOAR. But I understand the rule to be express that, objection or no objection, it is the right of any Senator who makes a motion to withdraw it unless the yeas and nays have been ordered. Now the Senator from New York made this motion; he has withdrawn it; the yeas and nays have not been called for; and therefore the matter stands open to debate as if the motion to lay on the table had not been made. That is my point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Chair is of the opinion that under the circumstances, the objection having been made pending the motion to lay on the table, that stopped the privilege of debate on that proposition; and a mere withdrawal by the Senator making that motion would not renew the privilege of debate after objection had been made.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the motion? To lay on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To lay the joint resolution on the table for the present. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the morning business through?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. If there be no further reports from standing or select committees the introduction of bills is in order.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2137) granting a pension to David Eells; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 2138) for the relief of Edward Braden and Job W. Angus; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 2139) to establish the order of promotion in the Medical Department of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2140) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to establish a subport of entry and a port of call at Port Angeles, Wash.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2141) for the relief of John Spicer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2142) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Owen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2143) granting a pension to William Wallace; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2144) granting an increase of pension to Grace F. Edes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (S. 2145) to amend section 3738 of the Revised Statutes relative to the eight-hour law; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2146) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to place on file in the War Department the names of the officers and members of the "Frontier Guards," mustered into the volunteer military service of the United States on the 18th day of April, 1861, and issue discharges to the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2147) granting a pension to George Faulk; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO BILL.

Mr. MILLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2056) to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or a leg in the service; which was ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SEWELL, it was Ordered, That James Casey have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in his case.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 349) for the promotion of anatomical science, and to prevent the desecration of graves;

A bill (S. 633) to change the name of Uniontown to Anacostia;

A bill (S. 1476) to amend an act of Congress approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin;"

A bill (S. 761) granting a pension to William Webster; and

A bill (S. 1125) granting a pension to Noah Nelson.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report showing the maintenance of the channel at the South Pass of the Mississippi River by Capt. James B. Eads during the quarters ending March 9, 1885, June 9, 1885, September 9, 1885, December 9, 1885, and March 26, 1886; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TIMBER SEIZURES.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to ascertain by what authority timber cut on the public domain by consent and knowledge and under the rulings and instruction of the Interior and Public Land Department is seized by said Department without due process of law and ordered to be sold without any judgment or execution directing the same.

NOTICES OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to give notice that to-morrow at 2 o'clock, or as soon thereafter as the business of the Senate will conveniently allow, I shall ask the Senate to go into executive session for the consideration of certain public matters.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to give a notice. Some time since I gave notice that on a day named I would ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 1407) in relation to Indian depredations, for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it. When the day arrived that I had designated the Senate was so engaged that I chose to let the business of the Senate proceed without interruption. I give notice now that on Friday next, after the morning business is concluded, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill for the purpose only of submitting some remarks.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that he fix 2 o'clock. The Senator can of course obtain the floor, as any Senator can, for the purpose of making remarks at any time; but if he sets a time before 2 o'clock it prevents action upon the ordinary business on the Calendar. I hope the Senator will say after 2 o'clock.

Mr. DOLPH. I prefer unless there is objection to take up the bill after the morning business, because I do not wish to antagonize the interstate-commerce bill which has been waiting so long.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to state that I have on several occasions designated a time at which I should move the consideration of the bill providing for the taxation of railroad lands. I had designated yesterday previous to 2 o'clock; but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] desiring to take the floor at that time that was abandoned. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] desires to take the floor to-day. I give notice now that to-morrow morning after the morning business I shall ask for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know whether we can come to have a vested right in this giving notice of what it is proposed to do. If so, I certainly have a vested right to move to-morrow morning to proceed to the transaction of pension business. I do not know but that the Senate has decided never to transact any more pension business.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Say after 2 o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR. For over three weeks I have been persistently making an effort to have a general pension bill considered, and then have three or four cases of special acts which ought to be taken up acted on. I will give one more notice, that to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the morning business——

Mr. VAN WYCK. Say after 2 o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR. No, after the morning business I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1886, which is a general pension bill. I hope to be able to get it acted on by the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the morning business concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is now closed.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution referred to will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. PLATT January 29, 1886:

Resolved, That executive nominations shall hereafter be considered in open session, except when otherwise ordered by vote of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER Mr. President, for the purposes of what I shall have to say on the resolution now under discussion it is not material when the rules proposed to be modified were adopted. I shall therefore not stop to inquire into their origin, continuance, or existence. The honorable Senator from Connecticut has given a historic narrative of the origin and operation of the rules. They have been standing rules of the Senate during my service here, and I have endeavored to give them loyal obedience. For the first time, in my judgment, a conspicuous and urgent occasion has arisen for their repeal or modification. This occasion has led me to examine with care the character and utility and object of the rules, and this has brought me to the conclusion that they ought to be abrogated. A brief comparison of the two political parties in respect to the business pertaining to executive sessions may serve to illustrate how the privileges of secret sessions may be abused.

Mr. President, when a Democratic majority controlled the policy of the Senate a few years ago it did not in secret session or elsewhere make refractory and factious opposition to the President of the United States, nor interfere with his constitutional prerogatives, nor attempt to paralyze his administration and impair the efficiency of the public service for party advantage, as the present Republican majority has done and is doing. If any body of men ever had excuse or incentive to throw obstacles in the path of a President it was that body of Democrats. Their party had been cheated by a fraud as flagrant and glaring as ever earned the execration of mankind, and the person who profited by that fraud by being inducted into the Chief Magistrate's office was bound hand and foot by his promoters to reward by appointments to offices of high trust and confidence the instruments employed to consummate the wrong, and right faithfully did he fulfill those obligations. I presume no man of any political creed or party will venture to deny this. Nobody denies it, and everybody admits it; and yet the Democratic majority made no factious opposition to the President's administration, preferring patriotically to trust to time and a returning sense of justice of the American people to right the wrong. He was given full sway to exercise his constitutional powers without let or hinderance under his responsibility to the people.

What is the present condition of affairs? We have a President whose election and inauguration were not questioned. He came into office without friends to reward or enemies to punish. He has exerted his best efforts and energies to give the people an efficient, business-like, honest administration. This, I think, is admitted on all sides, by party friends and party foes. While it can not be claimed the President has not made mistakes, it may be said with truth that all his methods of administrative reform have been in the line of improvement and in the interest of good government.

How has he been met by the Senate of the United States? By a frank, patriotic disposition to hold up his hands and re-enforce his efforts to give the people an efficient administration? Not at all, sir. But instead a carping, fault-finding, criticising, factious opposition, and every pretext to delay action on his nominations and recommendations.

Almost the first act of the majority of the Senate, or rather a relentless, incorrigible faction of that majority, which had dragooned its associates into acquiescence, was to call upon the President for his "reasons" for exercising his discretion under the Constitution, with which this Senate had no more to do than the council of Choctaws. "Reasons" were what was first asked for, and there is no use denying it, for the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] produced the record, as did other Senators. Discovering the absurdity of such a demand it was abandoned with ill-disguised humiliation, and "papers on file" were asked for. "Papers on file" which influenced or controlled the executive mind in the exercise of a legal discretion. These were properly refused, because the Senate has nothing to do with the exercise of that discretion. It was an officious, unwarranted invasion of the constitutional rights of the Executive, entered upon not to correct an abuse or promote reform, but to score a point for party, and the President would have been unworthy his high office and untrue to his obligations and trusts if he had not resisted and refused compliance with such a demand.

What do we see as the result? This same faction of the same majority taking the ground they will not confirm nominations made by the President, however meritorious and fit, however much the public service may suffer, however unwarrantable such a course may be made to appear; they will block the wheels of Government and paralyze the executive power if their partisan demands are not complied with. That is the position, sir, stripped of all disguises and pretenses. As well might we say to the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, if you do not transmit to the Senate the authorities and reasons which influenced your judicial discretion in a certain decree we will withhold the necessary appropriation for the transaction of the business of your court. What would be thought of such a proposition? And yet it is no more absurd and untenable than that into which this faction is trying to drag the Senate—into which it has drawn it.

There are great numbers of nominations now held by committees; nominations to fill vacancies created by resignations or terms expired, not by suspensions or removals, on which action is refused to the great detriment of the public service, to say nothing of injustice to the persons nominated. Is this done to promote good administration or gratify party spleen or gain party advantage? Admit for the sake of the argument the President has done wrong, would that be held a justification for the Senate in doing wrong by withholding consideration of the President's nominations? That seems to be the proposition. But when it is demonstrated over and over again the President was right, how can it be maintained with any show of consistency or reason that the Senate is justified? I shall not attempt, Mr. President, to restate the arguments so forcibly urged in support of the President's position.

But I desire to call attention to the situation to justify in part the vote I shall give in favor of the pending resolutions. I want the doors of this Senate thrown open and nominations of the President acted upon in open session in order that the country may be advised and informed of how frivolous and pretensive the grounds upon which action is refused and the responsibility lodged where it belongs.

It has been my habit to proceed cautiously and guardedly in such innovations as is proposed by this resolution, but with my sense of obligation and duty to those who have sent me here I can not longer permit such injustice to their rights without at least an effort to correct it, and this seems to be the most efficacious remedy. Aside from the foregoing considerations, Mr. President, my experience here convinces me there is no necessity or excuse for secret sessions except, perhaps, in considering treaties with foreign countries. It is a somewhat curious fact that this is the only parliamentary body of importance in the world, with perhaps one exception—to which I will refer later—which has among its rules of procedure provision for secret sessions.

Some days ago I addressed a letter to a distinguished representative of each of the Governments of Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain, and Mexico, making inquiry in regard to secret sessions in their respective parliamentary bodies, and also in regard to the manner of making appointments to office, and whether parliament or either branch had any supervision over appointments.

All have done me the honor to respond except the representative of Spain, and I submit extracts as follows. Referring to the British Parliament, my correspondent says:

I beg to inform you that no "executive" or "secret" session can be held in either house of the British Parliament. It is, however, competent for any member of either house of Parliament to move "that the galleries be cleared," but such a proceeding is unusual.

The executive session of the Senate of the United States does not obtain in English parliamentary procedure with regard to government appointments to office in England; neither house exercises any control with the exception of the officers of the two houses; they all emanate from the crown and the executive departments, subject to entrance by open competitive examination under the civil-service commission.

In regard to France, the reply is as follows:

WASHINGTON, March 31, 1886.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your inquiry of the 30th instant I have the honor to inform you that executive (secret) sessions are unknown in the rules and regulations of the French Parliament. With regard to appointments to office, they are made in France to commissioned officers by decree of the President of the French Republic, after having been proposed or recommended to him by the cabinet member of whose department this special officer depends. Officers of a lower rank are appointed by arrêté of the respective member of the cabinet alone.

All appointments in France are therefore solely made by the executive power, and entirely without the advice or consent of either senate or the "chambre des deputés" (chamber of deputies).

Members of the senate or of the chamber are, however, authorized to ask the respective member of the cabinet (ministré) questions (which are not voted upon) or to make interpellations regarding the appointments concerning his department. The parliamentary body then, after hearing in open session the minister's explanation, gives him the majority or puts him in the minority. These votes are, however, generally without result.

Yours, respectfully, &c.

The rules in the Mexican Congress will be understood from the following:

In reply to your favor of yesterday, inquiring if the Mexican senate has any rules for the holding of secret sessions and what matters are treated therein, I have the honor to inform you that the two houses of the Mexican Congress are governed by the regulations of December 23, 1824, which were substantially copied from those of the Spanish Cortes in force at that time, with the modifications consequent upon the republican form of government which was adopted by the Mexican constitution of October 4, 1824. The articles of said regulations referring to secret sessions are marked under numbers 34, 35, and 36, of which I inclose you a translation.

Although those regulations have been since amended on some points, I understand that the above articles are yet in force.

With sentiments of the highest esteem and consideration, I am, sir, your obedient servant.

[Translated from the rules of the two houses of the congress of the union of December 23, 1824.]

"SEC. 34. Secret sessions shall be held on Mondays and Thursdays of every week for the discussion of matters requiring secrecy, commencing at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

"SEC. 35. Should any matter of that kind come up outside of those days, not admitting of any delay, secret sessions shall be held at the opening or closing of the public session, on motion of a member of congress or of the speaker thereof, or at the request of the members of the cabinet on behalf of the government of the republic.

"SEC. 36. There shall be presented at secret session:

"1. Any charges which may be made against the members of the two houses, or of the president or vice-president of the republic, the members of the cabinet, governors of the states, or judges of the supreme court.

"2. Any communications marked confidential addressed by one house to the other.

"3. Matters of a purely economic character of the house.

"4. Ecclesiastical or religious matters.

"5. Other matters considered confidential by the president or the members of the cabinet."

In my letter, to which this is a reply, I omitted to inquire as to how appointments are made in Mexico, and hence the absence of the explanation.

The constitution of the German Empire provides as is set forth in the following letter:

MARCH 31, 1886.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I have the honor to answer your inquiries of yesterday as follows:

1. Article 22 of the constitution of the empire says: "The discussions of the Reichstag take place in open session." No secret sessions are mentioned.

2. Article 18 says: "The emperor makes the appointments to the offices of the empire." These appointments do not require any parliamentary confirmation.

With assurances, &c.

It may be insisted that the examples cited have no force or application, because the parliaments have no executive functions, no control over executive appointments, and therefore there is no occasion for secret or executive sessions. It appears, however, in point of fact, both the British and French Parliaments have the right to question executive officers in regard to appointments, and to that extent they have executive functions. Further on in this discussion I shall refer to an improvement which I think would accrue to our service if the same right should be allowed this body. Whether these foreign parliaments are endowed with executive functions or not does not affect the principle I contend for, and so ably and forcibly presented by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] in his exhaustive argument yesterday in behalf of open sessions.

Is it not somewhat remarkable that this Government, boasting of the sovereignty of the people, of its representative character, its free institutions, the direct responsibility of its officials to the people, the freedom of discussion on public matters, the influence of popular opinion, should be the only one in the family of great nations to close the doors of one branch of its Congress while considering questions of administration vital to the people's interest? Is there anything connected with the conduct of the affairs of the people more important to them than the character of the officials who are appointed to discharge a public trust? If not, why should the consideration of their appointments be concealed from the eyes of the public? There is really no good reason for it. The Constitution does not command it. There is no law directing it. The contemporaneous discussions do not disclose the object for which they were first adopted or why they were continued. The deliberations of the Continental Congress from 1774 to 1789 were all conducted in secret session, and the first three Congresses under the present Constitution, to 1794, were also held in secret.

I can account for this on no other hypothesis than that at the time this Government came into existence there was among the despotic nations of the Old World great jealousy of the principles upon which it was founded, and a corresponding caution in its deliberations and conduct to baffle the designs and thwart the intrigues of its enemies and strengthen the faith and confidence of its friends. Absolutism, despotism, imperialism, monarchy, feudalism, or by whatever name you may call it, had not relaxed its hold upon the throats of the people. France had made a spasmodic, desperate effort for liberty, but licentiousness, mistaken for "liberty and equality," paved the way for the first empire. Our struggle and success filled the crowned heads and despotisms with alarm, and they would spare no pains to obstruct the march of liberty regulated by law. Under these circumstances, the statesmen of that early day no doubt felt justified in hedging their deliberations about with the mystery of secret sessions, profiting by whatever protection they afforded the young Republic against its enemies.

Secret sessions, a necessity perhaps at first, grew into a practice and have been handed down as institutions sanctioned by custom. If this hypothesis be correct, the reason upon which the custom was founded no longer exists. We were then weak, more or less timid in dealing with foreign nations, not sure of our foothold as a government even with our own people.

Not so now. We are strong, independent, and fully abreast of the great nations of the earth, and except in transactions involving diplomatic considerations, having nothing to conceal or fear from foreign powers and surely nothing to conceal from our own sovereign. Is there anything in the administration of a popular government that requires concealment from the sovereign—the people? Surely not.

We are here as the agents and servants of the people, exercising a trust for them. As I have already suggested, should they not have a full and complete account of how that trust is discharged? It would seem so; and yet when we come to transact administrative duties as important as any other, namely, pass judgment on public officials, we shut the doors, close the blinds, and shroud ourselves in the mystery of secret sessions—at least that is the purpose, although it is not always realized. Besides, Mr. President, there is such a thing as obsoleteism in government as well as in laws. What is wise and proper to-day may be wholly inapplicable and insupportable a quarter of a century hence. In the half century just passed, steam and electricity have revolutionized commerce all over the world. Modern discovery in science and art, labor-saving implements, popular enlightenment and intelligence, and popular demands have upset our old methods of doing business. Our modern system of banking, the clearing-house, checks, and exchanges, have set aside the business methods and established business relations entirely different from those in use before the late improvements—if they are improvements; many old customs in every branch of human affairs have yielded and passed away before the march of new ideas and habits and processes. I do not know that I can better explain what I mean by obsoleteism as applied to this question than by quoting from the language of Chancellor Dargan, one of the most learned and distinguished jurists South Carolina has ever produced, in delivering the opinion of the court in the somewhat celebrated case of Jaggers vs. Estes (3 Strobhart's Equity). Discussing the flexibility of the common law, he said:

There are many principles recognized as law in South Carolina, as well as in England, not founded upon statute, that are diametrically opposed to what was considered the well-established principles of the common law. It is a system of law resting for its authority upon usages, and these usages are evidenced by judicial interpretations and the decision of cases brought before the courts for adjudication.

From such a system we must naturally look for mutations, and even revolutions, in the judicial exposition of the law. Upon such a code it would be unreasonable to expect that the changing features of each succeeding age would not be characteristically impressed. The common law has ever been admitted to possess a remarkable flexibility, which renders it capable of being adapted to the ever-varying wants of a progressive civilization in matters too minute or unimportant to call for legislative action. Upon the principles of obsoleteism (if I may use the expression) it drops, or throws off by its own inherent energy, that which the progress of society has rendered useless or inexpedient, and by the same vital force it eliminates new principles and develops extensive branches of jurisprudence, which are found in the ancient system, if there found at all, only in a rudimental state.

The common law of early times was the code of a semi-civilized people, in a state of military subjection to fuedal chiefs, with little wealth and few wants. It was then as rude as their own manners, or their own early Gothic manners. What is it now? A vast system of jurisprudence, admirably adapted to the necessities of a great, powerful, and wealthy people, possessed of a commerce, and boasting a refinement and civilization which surpass that of any other people of any other age of the world. Ponderous in its proportions, it is yet perfect and complete in its finish; alike adapted to the greatest exigences and interests as well as the minutest wants of society. How has this vast and complicated system been built up? In the progression of ages, mainly by what is opprobriously termed judicial legislation. Thus it is that the common law to-day is not that of fifty years since, nor that of fifty years since the common law of the preceding century. Nor is the common law of South Carolina always that of the mother country. It has, in many particulars, received a new impress and a new direction from our peculiar circumstances, habits, and institutions; and it would be absurd to say that we are under any obligation to follow the decisions of the English courts with blind submission.

So it is, Mr. President, with many things in the administration of this Government and of all governments—the principle of obsoleteism obtains, and it obtains here. The rule sought to be repealed by these resolutions ought to be repealed. Every deliberative assembly has an inherent right and power to close its doors whenever a majority of its members so decide. A convention immediately from the people has the power—and sometimes in cases of great emergency exercises it—of deliberating with closed doors, but there, as here, this course ought to be the exception, rather than as here, where the open executive session is the exception. Instead of greater secrecy in our deliberations there ought to be greater publicity. None but those who could stand the focused light of the public gaze would be sent to us, and great good would accrue to the public service. Opportunity would not be given the assassin of private character to secretly ply his avocation. Many an improper person would be kept out of Government employment and many a good man would escape slaughter in the darkness of secret sessions.

We have heard a good deal about "star-chamber methods" of the President in withholding his reasons for removals or suspensions—notably the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], who, among other things, said in his speech of March 11:

Thus the assumed kingly prerogative of the President places under lock and key the public records of the country, and denies the information which they contain, even in confidence, to the Senate, notwithstanding the President is, at the same time, asking it to advise and consent to the consummation of the assault, implied from his own professions of reform, which he has made on the character and reputation of the citizen concerned.

And again he said:

No matter what may be the grade of crime to him imputed, whether the gravest known to the law or the most insignificant found in its definitions, he is entitled to enjoy all of the protective forces organized by this imperial article of the Constitution. It is a superb monument marking the place where our fathers buried the star-chamber practices which charged, tried, and condemned men without notice or hearing.

Reference is here made to the sixth article of the constitutional amendments.

Mr. President, what was the method invented for the surrender of the professed reform purposes of the administration to the pressure of partisan demands? Simply the star-chamber method of inviting assaults upon the characters and reputations or the personal or official conduct of officers, and denying to them knowledge of the nature of the charges presented, and refusing opportunity for answer thereto. It was a simple process, but it was a wrong one. It answered the purpose of every citizen suspended from office. The legend "no secrets here" is taken down from its place above the "glass doors" of the abode of the administration, and the public official files are stowed away in dark closets under lock and key, all in the name of reform and the public interest.

Again he says:

The star-chamber method of procedure will never be approved by the people of this country. Any administration that insists upon its establishment will be execrated by the people, for partisan zeal can not outlive that devotion to fair play, exact justice, frank methods, and conservative regard for the rights of the citizen which is characteristic of our people.

Let us apply these emphatic observations of the distinguished Senator to our own "star-chamber methods," and correct them before going out of our way to assail another and co-ordinate branch of the Government.

The Senator from Indiana heads his fierce assault on the President in conspicuous head-lines, "Relations between the Senate and Executive Departments—Star-Chamber Methods," and then proceeds with most vigorous language:

That is the issue, and great as the constitutional questions involved here may be, it is practically a greater question whether this Government in its civil-service shall be administered as in a star chamber where accusations may be lodged and heard and decided without the knowledge of the man whose interests are to be affected and whose character is to be blackened."

After exciting the Senate alternately to tears with a pathetic recital of the sorrowful woes of Mrs. De la Hunt and the wrongs perpetrated on the "poor soldier," and to laughter by his vivid and hilarious description of the likeness of the Republican candidate for Vice-President [Mr. LOGAN], the Senator says:

Let us uncover this, Mr. President. I would like to have the world know, I would like to have the people of Indiana know just who it is here or in the House of Representatives that would file such charges and ask removal upon such a basis, and then recommend men of the description I have named to fill the place. I know what our good people would think of it. I know they would think it was a base and an insincere thing whoever did it. Let us uncover this box. The President may not know this. I can not but believe, as I say, that there are secrets here hidden from him, and that he ought to know of them, that he ought to know whether he has been trusting men in their recommendations for office who are asking him to turn out men as offensive Republicans and to put in men who put their claims to the office upon the ground that they want its emoluments to run a Democratic newspaper, and on no other ground in the case I have supposed. He ought to know it. If he is sincere, as I must assume, it would shake his confidence in some of his advisers, and there may be more excuse for the President than many of us are willing to admit in the unreliable character of his advisers.

From these expressions of the two Senators, so earnest and emphatic against "secret star-chamber methods," I shall expect them to aid in "uncovering this box" of ours. Will they have the courage to open the doors of this Senate so that the public may see the charges preferred against the President's nominations on which they have been held by these Senators for months and months? I doubt it. Other Senators on that side of the Chamber, with varying phrases and terms, have severally denounced the President for "withholding papers" from the Senate. Let us see if they will continue to withhold papers from the public. I have said, Mr. President, there is no constitutional mandate for "secret sessions." The only reference to secret sessions is found in paragraph 3, section 5, of Article I of the Constitution, which says:

Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy.

This provision is an affirmative recognition of that inherent power in all deliberative bodies, whether the business is legislative or executive.

It has been repeatedly affirmed in these halls and outside that Congress is the grand inquest of the country, and our secret sessions have been likened to the secret proceedings of a grand jury.

There is no analogy. There is nothing inquisitorial in the powers of Congress. They are purely legislative, except the executive functions of the Senate in regard to appointments and treaties and its judicial functions in impeachments; but there is nothing inquisitorial in these. No, Mr. President, it is misconception of the high duties of Congress to say they are inquisitorial. A most pernicious practice has grown up of appointing committees of investigation with powers intended to be inquisitorial (but when put to the test fortunately failed), to look into every conceivable complaint however frivolous or absurd. It is a most pernicious practice and ought to be abandoned. Committees of investigation may be properly authorized when information is sought to aid legislation, but very rarely otherwise. My observation and experience teach me that the nearest and surest and safest road to reform in the civil service is to throw wide open our doors for executive as well as legislative business and compel by law the members of the President's Cabinet to come upon the floors of Congress at stated times to answer questions, participate in debate, but without a vote, as was proposed by the bill of Hon. George H. Pendleton, late a Senator on this floor.

Nothing, in my opinion, would contribute more to that harmony and intelligent intercourse between the two co-ordinate branches of the Government so essential to orderly and efficient administration. Some have apprehended from this innovation an undue influence by the Executive; but, Mr. President, this, I submit, is also a great mistake and delusion. There is much more danger from legislative than executive encroachments; much more danger of converting this into a parliamentary—a government of unrestrained majorities—than a one-man government. The time for executive usurpation of power is passed and will not return until chaos reigns and the sword will have to be drawn to restore and preserve order. Let us hope that that time is in the very distant future if it must come, and that the true and fundamental principles of popular government may survive all encroachments from every source.

It has been said, Mr. President, that the sovereign of Great Britain reigns but does not govern, the President of the French Republic neither reigns nor governs, and that the Chief Magistrate of the United States governs but does not reign. This is in a measure true. The President of the United States governs by faithfully executing the law as laid down in the Constitution and laws of Congress. His power to govern does not extend one hair's breadth beyond that, and when he exceeds this jurisdiction he becomes a usurper and revolutionist. But in his faithful execution of the laws lies the strength and power and invincibility of this Government. Wise and just laws enacted by the legislative branch of the Government, faithfully executed by the executive, and honestly construed and interpreted by the judicial is the full measure of a perfect representative government, embracing the best principles of civil liberty and preserving the most cherished muniments of human rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina desire any action on the resolution?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has charge of the resolution.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to take up Order of Business 347.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from South Carolina is through with his remarks——

Mr. BUTLER. I am.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that my colleague does not desire to go on to-day; and as it is within a few minutes of 2 o'clock, I ask that the unfinished business be now taken up.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the pension bill be taken up, and then it will be the unfinished business in the morning hour. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before the hour of 2 o'clock arrives I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has submitted a motion.

Mr. BLAIR. I rose and addressed the Chair and made a motion before the Senator from Illinois was on his feet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Illinois first.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be, but I addressed the Chair very distinctly before the Senator from Illinois rose, and stated my motion and named the bill or the order of business when the Senator from Illinois addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CULLOM. I will yield, with the understanding that at precisely 2 o'clock the unfinished business shall be taken up.

Mr. BLAIR. I only desire to take the bill up that it may be read and that it may be the unfinished business in the morning hour. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Illinois at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator to allow me to offer an amendment to the pending resolution, on which I do not propose to make a remark.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for action on my motion and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRYE. There is no such thing as unfinished business in the morning hour.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that technically, but the Senate extends the courtesy of unfinished business in the morning hour, and has done so for several days.

Mr. FRYE. Not at all.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Secretary to take down my amendment, which is by way of substitute for the pending resolution; so as to make it read:

That all matters other than those relating to treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I yesterday gave notice that after the Senator from South Carolina was through I would take the floor; but there are only five minutes of the morning hour left. I desire it to be understood that I shall have the floor to-morrow morning during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois will be recognized as entitled to the floor when the subject is resumed.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

PENSION TO SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service, who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the Senate will remember that in the last Congress a general bill was passed by this body covering substantially all the inequalities and deficiencies existing in our pension laws or in the administration of them. That bill had been prepared with great care, the advice of the Pension Office had been taken, a great amount of data had been collected, and it was thought best by the committee of the Senate, and the judgment of the committee was ratified by that of the Senate also, that the bill included substantially all the legislation that seemed to be necessary as bearing upon the interests and as doing justice to the soldiers of the country in whatever war they may have been engaged. That bill passed the Senate and went to the House, where it failed. It was introduced at the beginning of this session in the Senate and also in the House, but difficulties arose in regard to dealing with the bill as a whole, and it was thought best to report separate bills covering the leading features that were embraced in the one I have referred to; and this bill now before the Senate contains a few sections eliminated from that bill. This is in terms the same, and its merits have already been discussed and considered.

It was estimated that the bill to which I have referred would have added to the annual burden of the country in the way of the pension-list about $50,000,000. In the nature of things it was impossible to compute the increase of the public expenditure with absolute accuracy, but from the best information that could be obtained the sum would have been about $50,000,000. I think the amount called for by this bill, should it become a law, would be somewhere from fifteen to twenty-five million dollars.

Mr. CULLOM. I supposed the Senator was only going to make a remark. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. BLAIR. I stated distinctly that I did not propose to interfere with the Senator, and I do not think he should interfere with me.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not disposed to do so, and I did not understand that I was doing so. I am willing the Senator should finish his remarks, but I want the unfinished business laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHACE in the chair). The Chair will lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Then I have no objection to yielding informally so that the Senator may conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not propose to interrupt the Senator by going beyond 2 o'clock. I was simply proceeding until in the ordinary way the Chair laid the unfinished business before the Senate. I am perfectly willing now to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CULLOM. The Chair was waiting, I take it, to let the Senator conclude without interruption. The Senator may have a few minutes if he desires.

Mr. BLAIR. I will not occupy the time further than to state that to the best of my ability to form an estimate upon the public expenditure resulting from this bill if it should become a law the amount will not be more than $25,000,000. It includes all those soldiers who, being honorably discharged, are now suffering from any disability, however contracted, provided the disability is not the result of any fault of their own, who are also, in addition to being disabled, dependent upon their own labor for support. It also includes dependent parents. Where both parents are living, it includes the mother. Where the mother is dead and the father is dependent, he is embraced in the provisions of the bill.

There are many reasons that could be assigned why this bill should become a law. I may advert perhaps to one of them. The Senate is aware that for many years what is known as the Mexican pension bill has been pressed, and I think meritoriously and with great persistence, upon the attention of the country. It has, however, always embraced one feature which, while adding very largely to the expense perhaps of administration should the Mexican pension bill become a law, would have been exceedingly dangerous to the Treasury of the country by reason of the precedent which it would contain for the almost immediate application of the principle of service pension to the soldiers of the late war. That principle and the proposition to apply it to the soldiers of the late war has already obtained a great deal of consideration in the country.

It may be that Senators will remember, those who were here during the last Congress, that a very large number of the Grand Army posts of the country memorialized both Houses in favor of the passage of a service-pension law embracing the soldiers of the war for the Union. It would be impossible for any one probably to estimate the expense of such a law, because no one can tell how many of the soldiers of the war for the Union are still surviving; but I do not think if it should become a law it would add any less than one million names to the pension-roll of the country. I do not think that the expenditure under such a law would be less than $150,000,000, and I hardly think less than $200,000,000 annually.

Notwithstanding this immense expenditure, this great burden which by such a law would be cast on the finances of the country, there has grown up a very strong feeling that something like justice demands the passage of this bill, and there is a still stronger feeling that it is the duty of the country to see that those who engaged in the war for its preservation and who are now for any cause disabled, provided it is not a cause attributable to their own vice or their own wrong practices, and who are also dependent upon their own labor for support, should receive from the country itself that assistance which must come from somebody, either from their friends, who usually are as impoverished as themselves, from local charity, from the ordinary charity provided for the paupers in the various States, or through the Grand Army of the Republic, which has undertaken the support of this class of our soldiery to as great an extent possibly as it is able to bear.

The Senator from Illinois desires to proceed with his bill, and I will take the opportunity of submitting what further remarks of a general character I wish to make on this bill when it comes up again.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to ask the Senator from New Hampshire one question in connection with this pension bill?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. What will be the change between the amount allowed under this bill and under the regular laws now?

Mr. BLAIR. The bill provides, so far as dependent parents are concerned, for the same increase from $8 to $12 a month as has already been provided in the bill, which has become a law, for widows. The provision in this act for those who may be disabled and also dependent upon their own labor for support is a sum not exceeding $24 a month. The Senator will find in line 18 of the first section on the second page the provision covering the point to which he has referred:

The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is it now by law?

Mr. BLAIR. There is no provision made for cases of this kind by law at all. This bill proposes to give pensions to an entirely new and different class. It may include those who would be entitled to pensions under the general laws already existing, but who, on account of the failure of proof and for other reasons, may find it difficult to establish their right, and see proper, being disabled—that being a matter easily demonstrable—and also poor, to take their claim from the General Government under this bill, thereby waiving their right under the general laws already existing.

Mr. COCKRELL. The point I want to get at is, would not this bill practically increase the rate of pension from $8 to $24 a month?

Mr. BLAIR. No, because it would not be given in any case where a man draws pension under the general law. He must make his election. If he draws his pension under the general law, then he can take nothing under this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would not all the applicants necessarily place their applications under this law and draw $24?

Mr. BLAIR. No, not at all. This bill would allow a pension of only $24 at the uttermost, whereas under the general law a pensioner might receive $72. If he chooses to take under this bill, he can get but $24.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I shall have to proceed with the regular order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the Senator will yield a moment, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire. There is one feature in the bill that I did not understand, though I am on the Committee on Pensions. Therefore it is that I desire now to offer as an amendment this proviso, which I will explain at another time.

Provided, That no soldier under this act shall receive less than $8 per month.

Mr. CULLOM. Now I ask for the regular order.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. Before proceeding to make any remarks in regard to the bill, I desire in behalf of the committee to offer a few amendments, which are mainly formal.

I offer first an amendment to section 5, lines 16 and 17. The amendment is, to strike out, after the word "the," in line 16, all down to and including the word "and," in line 17, as follows: "manner, extent, and localities to which they shall apply and" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "places."

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator please repeat the lines? I did not catch them.

Mr. CULLOM. I propose an amendment to section 5, commencing in line 16, after the word "the," by striking out the words "manner, extent, and localities to which they shall apply and" and inserting in lieu of those words the word "places;" so as to read:

And said commission shall from time to time prescribe the measure of publicity which shall be given to such rates, fares, charges, and classifications, or to such part of them as it may deem it practicable for such common carriers to publish, and the places in which they shall be published.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to amend section 5, line 29, by inserting the word "previous" between the words "without" and "public;" so as to read:

No advance in such published rates, fares, charges, and classifications shall be made except after ten days' public notice, but reductions in the same may be made without previous public notice.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I move in the same section, line 31, to strike out the word "changes;" and also in line 32, after the word "and," to insert "of changes in;" so as to read:

And the commission shall prescribe the manner in which notice of advances and reductions in such published rates, fares, charges, and of changes in classifications shall be given.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. In section 7, line 7, I move that the word "one" be stricken out before "thousand" and "five" inserted; so as to read:

SEC. 7. That any common carrier who shall willfully do, cause to be done, or permit to be done any of the acts, matters, or things in this act declared to be unlawful shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States within whose jurisdiction such offense was committed, be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. In lines 9 and 10, of section 7, I move that the words "its principal" be stricken out before the word "officer;" in the same line, after the word "officer," to strike out the words "or traffic manager, by whatever name called, or the;" in line 9, before the word "officer," to insert "any;" and after the word "person," in line 10, to insert the words "connected therewith;" so as to read:

Provided, however, That whenever such common carrier is a corporation, any officer, agent, or person connected therewith who shall be guilty of any such violation of this act, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Then in line 15 of the same section, I move to strike out the word "one" and insert "five;" so as to read:

Provided, however, That whenever such common carrier is a corporation, any officer, agent, or person connected therewith who shall be guilty of such violation of this act, shall be personally liable as and for a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States within whose jurisdiction such offense was committed, shall be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I did not get the Senator's statement of the previous amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I will again read the clause as proposed to be amended.

Provided, however, That whenever such common carrier is a corporation, any officer, agent, or person connected therewith who shall be guilty of any such violation of this act, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia object?

Mr. BROWN. No.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is only trying to get the words. Then in section 12, after the word "commission," in line 20, I move to insert:

And to the satisfaction of the party or parties complaining.

So as to read:

And if, within the time specified, it shall be made to appear to the commission that such common carrier has ceased from such violation of law, and has made reparation for the injury found to have been done, in compliance with the report and notice of the commission, and to the satisfaction of the party or parties complaining, a statement to that effect shall be entered of record by the commission, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. In section 9, lines 10 and 14, I move to insert the words "and testimony" before the words "of witnesses" in each of those two lines; so as to read:

And for the purposes of this act the commission shall have power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. These are the only amendments I desire to offer; and I now wish to say a few words generally with reference to the bill.

I am not disposed to discuss the general subject of the regulation of interstate commerce, for the reason that it was very extensively discussed during the last term of Congress when the bill was before the Senate for consideration, and I think the Senate and the country generally agree that some legislation ought to be enacted.

The select committee appointed by the Senate about a year ago has prosecuted the investigation it was charged with, doing as best it could. It has made its report to the Senate, which report, with the testimony taken, is before the Senate and the country, and along with it the committee reported the bill now under consideration.

I believe I am justified in saying that there is no subject of a public nature that is before the country about which there is so great unanimity of sentiment as there is upon the proposition that the National Government ought in some way to regulate interstate commerce. The testimony taken by the committee shows conclusively to my mind, and I think to every man's mind who reads it, that there is a necessity for some legislation by the National Government looking to the regulation of interstate commerce by railroads and by water ways in connection therewith.

I believe the time has gone by when it is necessary for any one to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the proposition that Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce. These questions have been discussed over and over again in Congress, and the highest judicial tribunals of the country have decided over and over again that Congress has the power to regulate commerce among the States. So I do not feel at liberty, if I were disposed, to occupy the attention of the Senate in discussing the general question of whether the people of the United States want Congress to do anything, or whether there is any necessity for our doing anything, or the question of the constitutional right of the Congress of the United States to pass some act regulating commerce among the States.

If the three propositions are correct, that the public sentiment is substantially unanimous that we should act, that the necessity for action exists, and that the power of Congress is admitted, the only question left is what Congress ought to do specifically; in other words, what kind of an act should Congress pass? The committee has reported a bill which is the best judgment that the committee had upon the subject, and I may say about which substantially the committee is unanimous in its judgment in favor of it. There may be one or two points in connection with the bill that the committee was not entirely unanimous concerning, but which I will only intimate may be so.

So, Mr. President, all I desire to do in connection with the bill is to explain as specifically as I can, without taking up too much time, the meaning of the provisions of the bill, and the reasons, very briefly suggested, for the provisions of the bill as they are contained in it.

The general legislation proposed in the bill is contained in the first seven sections, the remainder being devoted to the organization of a commission and to the details of its operation as a means of securing the enforcement of the act.

The general theory of the measure is that as unjust discrimination in its various forms is recognized as the chief of all evils growing out of the existing methods of railroad management it is the duty of Congress to strike at that evil above all things else. The bill has accordingly been drawn with that end in view. The first section defines and prescribes the scope and application of the bill. The second, third, and fourth sections specifically prohibit and declare unlawful the various forms of unjust discrimination between persons, between different commodities or particular kinds of traffic, and between places. The fifth section requires the publication of rates and declares it unlawful to charge more or less than the public rates. The sixth section provides that shipments shall be considered as continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, and prohibits combinations to evade the provisions of the act by breaking of bulk, carriage in different cars, transshipment, or other devices. The seventh is the general-penalty section. It makes the performance of any acts declared unlawful in the preceding sections a misdemeanor and fixes the penalty.

In connection with these sections I desire to call attention to section 20, in which it is expressly stipulated that the provisions of this act shall not in any way abridge or alter the common-law remedies now open to the shipper, but shall be considered as in addition to such remedies, except that the remedy at common law and that proposed in the bill shall not both be prosecuted at the same time. Under the terms of the bill no one is obliged to appeal to the commission, and two courses are open to any one who may be aggrieved by the violation of any one of these general provisions which I have mentioned. He is simply obliged to elect which course he will adopt, and may at his own pleasure either bring suit in the courts on his own account for the recovery of overcharges or damages, or he may ask the commission to arbitrate the controversy, and, if necessary, to investigate his complaint, the advantage of the latter course being that in the event of a favorable finding by the commission his evidence is collected for him without expense to himself, and he can if it becomes necessary go into court with a prima facie case already established.

It is substantially agreed by those who have investigated the question of railroad regulation, that publicity is the most effective remedy for the evils most seriously complained of, so far as it is possible to remedy them by legislation. There are two directions in which a greater measure of publicity is essential and can be secured by legislation. The first is as to the rates actually charged, in order that every shipper may know whether he is treated fairly and without unjust discrimination. The second is as to the methods of management and financial operations of the railroad corporations, in order that the net results of their business may be accurately known, and that the public may be placed in a position to determine the reasonableness of the charges made, which are in the nature of a tax upon commerce. The publication of rates as provided in the fifth section is intended to in part meet the first requirement I have mentioned, and the bill proposes to meet both the first and second by the creation of a commission authorized to secure the enforcement of the law and with ample power to investigate every detail of railroad management, and to enforce the making of complete and accurate reports by the corporations. If the railroads can be compelled to let in the sunlight of publicity upon all ther operations, personal favoritism and the chief causes of complaint will to a great extent disappear, and the accurate information obtained will enable the law-making power to devise any further remedies that it may be possible to apply by legislation. With this brief explanation of the general scope of the bill, I will now invite the attention of the Senate to the provisions and meaning of the different sections more in detail.

By the terms of the first section, the provisions of the bill are made to apply only to transportation by or upon a railroad, except where a railroad and water route are together used for a continuous carriage or shipment. The pending bill goes further than others which have been before Congress in proposing to regulate the transportation of passengers as well as of freight, because there seems to be no good reason why so important a branch of the railroad business as the passenger traffic should not be made the subject of regulation as well as the freight traffic. While the provisions of the bill are made to apply mainly to the regulation of interstate commerce, in order to regulate such commerce fairly and effectively it has been deemed necessary to extend its application also to certain classes of foreign commerce which are intimately intermingled with interstate commerce, such as shipments between the United States and adjacent countries by railroad, and the transportation by railroad of shipments between points in the United States and ports of transshipment or of entry when such shipments are destined to or received from a foreign country on through bills of lading. To avoid any uncertainty as to the meaning of these provisions in regard to what may be at the same time in some instances State and foreign commerce, it is expressly provided that the bill shall not apply to the transportation of property wholly within one State and not destined to or received from a foreign country.

The bill is not intended to affect the stage-coach, the street railway, the telegraph lines, the canal-boat, or the vessel employed in the inland or coasting trade, even though they may be engaged in interstate commerce, as it would do if it was made to apply to all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, because it is not deemed necessary or practicable to cover such a multitude of subjects. It is aimed at the regulation of the railroad corporations, but the definition of the term "railroad" given in the first section is intended to bring within the application of the bill all the numerous instrumentalities of shipment or carriage by or upon a railroad, such as the fast-freight lines, express companies, sleeping-car companies, or any other organizations which undertake any part of the work of a carrier by railroad.

No reason is apparent why these independent and auxiliary agencies of transportation should not be made subject to supervision and regulation as well as the railroad corporations that have intrusted them with the performance of a portion of their public duties, while it is plain that if they should be left unrestricted in their operations the opportunities for evasion of the law by the railroads would be greatly increased, and it is clear that the same necessity exists for protecting the people against discriminating or unreasonable charges by the fast-freight lines and these other outside agencies as on the part of the railroad corporations themselves. The concluding paragraph of the first section asserts the common-law requirement that all charges made in the transportation of passengers or property by or upon a railroad shall be reasonable and just.

SECTION 2.

The second section strikes at the evil of which the most serious complaint is made, and made justly, by prohibiting and declaring unlawful every variety of personal favoritism or unjust discrimination between persons. Its provisions are confined to that one great evil, and the object of the section is to place all shippers upon an absolute equality as to the rates charged for a like service under substantially similar circumstances. This section specifically prohibits special rates, rebates, drawbacks, or other devices for discriminating between shippers similarly situated and making like shipments. This particular and almost universal form of unjust discrimination is carefully defined in this section, and in addition to the fine provided for such an offense in section 7 the carrier is made liable for all charges collected from all persons in excess of the lowest rate charged any person for like shipments during the same period. This section is a most important one, and seems to have been made as strong as possible; but if it can be strengthened in any way, I for one would be willing to make it stronger in order to do every thing possible to break up the existing system of personal favoritism.

SECTION 3.

The third section is broader and more general in its terms, and should perhaps have been made the second section, as it contains a general prohibition of every variety of unjust discrimination. The section covers two subjects. The first paragraph prohibits the giving of any undue or unreasonable preference to any particular person or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatever, and declares such a preference unlawful, which by section 7 is made a misdemeanor punishable by fine. This covers in general terms, though by no means so completely, the provisions of section 2 as to discriminations against persons, but goes further and includes discriminations against localities or particular descriptions of traffic. The language adopted in this paragraph is substantially that of the English statute on the subject, which has been repeatedly construed by the English courts, so that its meaning has already been judicially established. The second part of the section is modeled in part upon the English and in part upon similar statutes in several of the States. Its purpose is to require railroads to furnish to connecting roads all reasonable and proper facilities for the interchange of traffic that may be necessary for the convenience of the public, and to prevent one road, or a combination of roads, from "freezing out" a connecting line by refusing to accept traffic from it or deliver traffic to it upon any terms, as has been done.

Section 3 in general terms prohibits undue discriminations against localities, but section 4 is more specifically directed against that evil, by prohibiting a greater aggregate charge for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, and from the same original point of departure. This is the general declaration made, and it is agreed that this is the principle that should be observed as a general rule. The committee found, however, that this principle was not of universal application; that there were cases in which the railroads were compelled to make lower rates for longer than for shorter distances by the great law of competition, which is stronger than any law we can make, and that in some cases it would be a great hardship to the public as well as to the railroads to rigidly enforce the general principle.

In order to provide for these exceptional cases it was agreed that the commission should be authorized to make exceptions in cases where on investigation it may be found necessary and proper, and by general rules cover exceptions in cases where there is competition by river, sea, canal, or lake, from the operation of the fourth section of the act. In the judgment of at least a majority of the committee such a provision of law is necessary in order to get the benefit of any short-haul provision and at the same time do no injustice to the business of the country. The public sentiment of the country favors a provision of law prohibiting, without exceptions, a charge of more for a short than for a long haul on the same line of road, in the same direction, and from the same point of departure.

As a general proposition, common carriers should not be allowed to do so, and in hundreds and thousands of instances great injustice is done to localities by such a mode of unjust discrimination, and the committee have attempted to provide against such discrimination by prohibiting it except in such cases as a wise commission may determine that the interests of the commerce of the country and common fairness to the common carrier require that exceptions shall be made.

The interest of both the producer and consumer of this country require that the food and fuel, which make up half of the property transported, shall be brought as nearly together as possible, so that the producer shall be able to produce and live and that the consumer shall be able to buy and eat and live. Distance must be as nearly as possible overcome, so that the grain and produce of the far West and North may be put down at as cheap rates as may be by the side of the manufacturer, the consumer, in the East.

So, Mr. President, looking at the question in its effect upon the business and prosperity of the whole country, the committee did not and do not now believe that such a provision of law as would prohibit the greater charge for the shorter distance in all cases would be a wise one; hence the qualification in the bill.

Those who favor an absolute short-haul provision assert that the provision of the bill will amount to nothing; while those against any law touching the short-haul question assert that it is too strong, and should be further modified or go out of the bill. As it stands it is largely in the discretion of the commission, and as the whole scheme of national control is new in this country, in my judgment it is wisest to go no further than the committee proposes on so doubtful a point until we see the operation of the law, if it shall become one, and get a report from the commission on the question, if one shall be established.

SECTION 5.

The purpose of section 5 is to secure the greatest possible publicity of rates and charges. As I have said, investigation and experience show that this is the best remedy for the evils of unjust discrimination. But while this is generally believed to be the proper remedy, a practical difficulty is met with in attempting to apply it.

So far as any one railroad is concerned, or any one system of roads under the same management, there ought to be little difficulty. Even if there should be 10,000 miles of road under one management, that corporation could post up or otherwise publish at each station on its line a complete schedule of its rates on all classes of freights to the hundreds of other stations on its roads. To do this it might perhaps become necessary to cover the walls of its stations with schedules of rates, or to print a very bulky volume to contain them, but it could certainly be done.

But when Congress orders this corporation to also publish rates from the hundreds of stations upon its lines to the thousands and thousands of stations upon all the other lines throughout the whole United States to which it may at some time or other be called upon to accept shipments, the practical difficulty of enforcing a sweeping requirement that all interstate rates shall be posted or otherwise published must be apparent. A sweeping requirement of this character would interfere with the freedom of commercial intercourse and work a great hardship to the public, because it would be in effect a prohibition of shipments to points to which rates had not been previously published. The only way in which the railroads could comply with such a requirement would be by publishing rates to the great competitive centers and by refusing to make through rates or give through bills of lading to the less important points throughout the country. This they would be free to do, because they are not compelled to act as forwarders, and it is only because it is to their interest to promote the convenience of the public by doing so that they issue through bills of lading and assume the responsibility of acting as forwarding agents. No matter how strong the statute might be made or how severe the penalties affixed, I do not see how an absolute requirement of that character could possibly be fully enforced. It is not a question as to the power of Congress to impose such a requirement upon the corporations, but simply the practical question of whether it is possible for the common carriers to comply with it if they were ready and willing to do so.

But this is not the only difficulty encountered when we attempt to apply such a provision to the more than 125,000 miles of railroad in the United States. No one road can make or publish rates over any other except by the consent of the latter. How, then, are the through rates under which perhaps half of the traffic of the country is transported to be published? They are now and must continue to be established by agreement between the roads interested. It would therefore be obviously unfair to hold one carrier responsible for the violation by another carrier of an agreement as to through rates.

But as a matter of fact it does not seem to be necessary to have every interstate rate actually included in the publication proposed in order to secure practical publicity. If each railroad should simply publish rates between the points on its lines and the principal places in the United States, the provisions of section 3, prohibiting discriminations against any locality and particularly those of section 4 as to the short haul, would, it seems to me, fix the rates at all other shipping points and would substantially protect the people at the interior and less important points. The provisions of this section recognize these practical difficulties in the way of securing the absolute publication of all interstate rates and only propose to require what it is possible to enforce. The section requires every carrier subject to the provisions of the act to file with the commission copies of its tariffs of rates and fares, and charges of every kind, and from time to time all changes in the same which are to be made public in such manner as the commission may direct and so far as in its judgment be deemed practicable.

The theory of these provisions is that the commision will require such rates to be made public as it is evident can be published without difficulty, and will then add by degrees to those to be published until as many as possible are included. The plan of doing the railroad business upon a system of established and published rates is entirely new in this country, and will revolutionize existing methods of business. It therefore seems to be the part of wisdom and prudence to put this new and untried system into operation gradually, and to feel our way along cautiously rather than to plunge into legislation of which we can not fully foresee the results.

Under the provisions of the section as it stands it is made unlawful to charge any person more or less than the published rate, and the carriers are required to adhere to such published rates until they have been changed in the manner specified. The published rates can not be increased except after ten days' public notice. They may be reduced without previous public notice, but immediate notice of such reductions must be given in such manner as the commission may direct. Regarding the publicity of rates as essential to the success of any plan of regulation and as of the first importance, the committee proposed a more radical and severe penalty for the violation of this section than of any other. The last paragraph, beginning in line 47, page 7, provides that a failure or refusal to file or publish its tariff shall subject a carrier to a writ of mandamus to compel compliance with the requirements of this section, and that failure to comply with the mandamus shall be punishable as for contempt. And if that should not answer to enforce compliance with the law, the courts are also authorized to restrain railroads from engaging in interstate business until they publish their rates as required.

SECTION 6.

Section 6 declares it to be unlawful for any common carrier to enter into any combination or agreement to prevent the carriage of freights from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, and provides that no breaking of bulk, stoppage, or interruption shall prevent the carriage of freights from being treated as continuous, unless made for some necessary purpose and not with the intention of evading the provisions of the act. The purpose of this section is to prevent evasions of the act by such devices as rebilling or transshipping at State lines, for instance, so as to make it appear that an interstate shipment was a State shipment and not affected by Congressional legislation.

SECTION 7.

Section 7 provides that any common carrier who shall willfully do or permit to be done any of the acts or things declared in the preceding sections to be unlawful shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction therof, be fined not more than $5,000. The purpose is to make the person responsible for the violation of the law subject to the penalty, and it is therefore provided that if the carrier is a corporation the officer, agent, or person guilty of any violation of the act shall be personally liable for the fine imposed.

SECTION 8.

Section 8 creates a commisssion of five members, who are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and to serve for terms of six years. It is provided that not more than three of the commissioners shall be selected from the same political party, and that they shall not own railroad stock or bonds or engage in any other employment.

SECTION 9.

Section 9 prescribes the general jurisdiction of the commission. It is given authority to inquire into the management of the business of all railroads and other common carriers subject to the provisions of the act, and to keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted. To this end the commission is given the right to obtain from such carriers all the information necessary to enable it to perform its duties, and may also invoke the aid of the courts in requiring the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers. Provision is made for the punishment by the courts of a common carrier or any person connnected therewith who shall refuse to obey a subpœna issued by the commission.

Sections 10, 11, 12, and 13 regulate the method of procedure by the commission in the settlement and investigation of differences arising between shippers and carriers. The experience of the State commissions has shown that a very large proportion of the complaints ordinarily made can be settled without special investigation or delay, and as a matter of fact by far the greater portion of them are promptly and satisfactorily adjusted when the commission calls the attention of the railroad officials to them. It is often difficult for the ordinary shipper to reach the head of a great railroad corporation with his grievances, but the existence of a commission gives the humblest shipper an assurance that his complaint will reach headquarters. It is easy to understand how in these great corporations the details of management must be left largely to subordinates, who may exceed their authority and perhaps successfully conceal from their official chiefs all knowledge of complaints that are made.

There are numerous ways in which differences may arise between shipper and carrier through mistakes or misunderstandings which are easily adjusted when the facts are understood. The method of procedure marked out for the commission is intended to provide for the speedy adjustment of all such complaints as I have indicated, as well as those based upon a state of facts which the carrier will not attempt to excuse or defend. In this way it is believed that a considerable share of the complaints submitted can be disposed of to the complete satisfaction of the complainants without unduly taxing the time of the commission, which would be blockaded with business if an investigation was required in every case.

SECTION 10.

I desire to call special attention to this section of the bill. It provides that any person, firm, corporation, or association, any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, any body politic or municipal organization, or any State railroad commission may complain in writing to the commission of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier in violation of law, or that the commission may institute investigations on its own motion. When complaint is made the commission is required to forward a statement of the charges to the carrier and to call upon the latter to adjust the matter or make answer within a specified time. If the complaint should be satisfied, that is the end of the matter. If it can not be thus disposed of, it becomes the duty of the commission to investigate the matters complained of in such manner and by such means as it shall deem proper. Such investigations may be conducted in any part of the United States by one or more of the commissioners, but a majority of the commission is required for the final determination of a case.

SECTION 11.

The next step in the proceedings is covered by the provisions of section 11, which requires the commission to make a report in writing whenever an investigation is made, which report shall include the findings of fact upon which the conclusions of the commission are based and its recommendations as to what reparation, if any, should be made by the carrier to the parties found to have been aggrieved. A copy of such report shall be furnished to the complainant and the carrier.

I desire to say that in the investigation we have made the most prominent and, so far as appearances have indicated in the States, the most influential commissions that we had any conversation with, and who were heard before us, are simply in the States to-day asking that provisions of law be passed by their States, prominently, for instance, the commission in the State of New York, which is a very able commission and which seems to be substantially satisfactory to the people of that State—are merely appealing to their Legislature to-day, I think, for that much more power than they have already under the law, which so far is simply the right to investigate and report, so that, whatever they find to be the facts, those findings of fact shall be made prima facie evidence in courts of law wherever the testimony may be heard. I regard that provision of this bill as a very important one and of great service to the people, because substantially the commission makes the case on which the party goes into court, if the case has to go there and is not settled by the action of the commission.

One of the most important features of the bill is the provision in this section that the findings of the commission in an investigation shall be taken in all judicial proceedings as prima facie evidence as to each and every fact found. The purpose and necessity of this change in the ordinary rules of evidence can perhaps be best illustrated by reading a few paragraphs from the report of the committee. In considering this branch of the subject the committee say:

> The simple fact that the shipper is now obliged to submit to the adjudication of his complaint by the other party in interest, the party by whom he supposes himself to have been aggrieved, is in itself sufficient to demonstrate the necessity of such legislation as will secure to the shipper that impartial hearing of his complaints to which he is entitled by all the recognized principles of justice and equity.
> Evidence is not wanting to prove that the remedy at common law is impracticable and of little advantage to the ordinary shipper. It has been found so by the people of the States in dealing with their local traffic, and, as has been shown, their recognition of the fact has been authoritatively recorded in nearly every State in the Union by statutory enactments, and in many of them by the establishment of commissions, in the effort to provide for the shipper that prompt and effective remedy which it has been found by experience that recourse to the common law has failed to afford. The reasons for this failure apply with even greater force to the more complicated transactions of interstate commerce than to State traffic, because the former involve more perplexing questions and are affected by a greater diversity of varying conditions. The legislation of the States, the reports of the State commissions, the records of the courts, the evidence of shippers, and, in short, the whole current of testimony, is to the same effect; and the fact stated is also admitted by some of the highest railroad authorities. Mr. Fink says:
> "In many cases where small amounts are involved, which do not justify legal proceedings against the company, the aggrieved parties are prevented from prosecuting their claims. * * * Ordinary courts are not properly constituted for that purpose, and the time required for the adjudication of claims is so long and the expenses so great as to defeat the very object for which proceedings are instituted." (Testimony, page 107.)
> Leaving out of consideration the natural disinclination of the average shipper to engage in litigation with a corporation which may have the power to determine his success or failure in business, and to enter the lists against an adversary with ample resources and the best legal talent at its command and able to wear out an opponent by the tedious delays of the law, it is plain that the shipper is still at a great disadvantage in seeking redress for grievances under the common law, which places upon the complainant the burden of proof and requires him to affirmatively establish the unreasonableness of a given rate or the fact of an alleged discrimination. What such an undertaking practically involves is indicated by the following extract from the statement of Mr. Kernan, the chairman of the New York commission, which sums up the whole case:
> "Assuredly there have been and do exist unreasonable rates and unjust discriminations. This much will be admitted by all; it will not be denied even by any carrier. Why, then, have not the courts enjoined the continuance of the wrongs and enforced the payment of damages? Why, again, is it that substantially no such suits ever have been brought and that so few decisions in this country exist? It is not because of defects in the law or in the constitution of the courts; but it is because the subject is one which neither client nor lawyer, judge nor jury, can unravel or deal with intelligently within the compass of an ordinary trial and with such knowledge of the matter as men generally well educated possess. Let a man take the testimony in five volumes before the Hepburn committee; read one hundred pages of the clear and able statements of Mr. Blanchard, for instance; con over the facts and figures he gives, and then let him try to reach a conclusion upon the question under discussion. Some conception will thus be obtained of what a lawsuit is which involves the reasonableness of rates, or the existence of an unjust discrimination, or a local rate as compared with a through rate. As the onus is upon the complainant, add to his difficulties the fact that his adversary has nearly all the evidence in his possession, locked up in books and in the memory and intelligence of experts who have made the subject their study. The expense involved, the uncertainty to be faced, and the difficulties to be overcome in an ordinary suit at law have made that remedy obsolete and useless."

SECTION 12.

The twelfth section points out the course to be taken subsequent to an investigation. If it be found that the law has been violated or that any injury has been sustained by the complainant or other parties aggrieved, it becomes the duty of the commission to notify the carrier to desist from the further violation of the law or to make reparation for the injury done, or both, according to the circumstances of the case. If the carrier shall be willing to accept the adverse finding of the commission and to settle with the complainant or those injured, without further contest, it is given an opportunity to do so. This is to the interest of the complainant, as it saves him the delay and uncertainty of litigation, and the basis of settlement is always under his control and must meet his approval. If, however, the carrier should decline to make settlement in accordance with the finding of the commission, or should presist in violating the law after notice to desist, the commission is required to certify that fact to the district attorney of the proper district, and to forward him a copy of its report in the case. If may be claimed that, if resort must finally be had to the courts, the complainant gains nothing by the creation of a commission or by appealing to it for relief, but that does not fairly state the case.

In the first place, we are justified by the experience of the State commissions in believing that the mere fact of the existence of such a tribunal would have the effect of materially diminishing the causes of complaint. In the second place, we are justified in believing that under the course of procedure which has been proposed, and with the aid of the great force of public opinion, the commission would be of great service to the people in bringing about an amicable adjustment of the larger portion of the complaints submitted promptly and to the entire satisfaction of the complainant. But, in the third place, even in those cases in which resort to the courts should happen to become necessary, the complainant would gain rather than lose by prosecuting his case before the commission. All he could lose would be the time occupied in the investigation, while he would gain an immense advantage by having a prima facie case established and by the summary methods provided for its prosecution, and by having his case prosecuted by the Government.

Section 13 provides that when a case has been certified to the district attorney he shall forthwith bring suit in the name and on behalf of the parties aggrieved for the recovery of the damages sustained. In cases in which the carrier has persisted in violating the law after notice from the commission to desist, it is also made the duty of the district attorney to apply for and of the court to grant a temporary injunction restraining the carrier from further violation of the law until the matter can be fully heard. Without this provision for a summary injunction upon the prima facie case established by the report of the commission, the railroad company could afford to continue violating the law and use all its energies to delay the litigation, and would have the same object in adopting these tactics that it has to-day. But under the provisions of this section the carrier would have nothing to gain by delay, and would in any event be immediately compelled by the courts to desist from what the commission declared to be a violation of law until the courts could determine the question.

THE REMAINING SECTIONS.

Section 14 relates to the conduct of the work of the commission.

Section 15 provides for the salaries and expenses of the commission and its employés.

Section 16 authorizes sessions in any part of the United States whenever necessary.

Section 17 requires annual reports to be made to the commission by the carriers, and specifies in detail particular information that such reports shall contain.

Section 18 requires an annual report to be made by the commission, which is to contain such information and data as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the regulation of commerce, with such recommendations as to additional legislation as the commission may deem necessary.

Section 19 requires the commission to specially investigate the subject of pooling, and to report to Congress whether any legislation on that subject is advisable.

Section 20 exempts from the provisions of the act property carried for the United States, State or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to fairs or expositions for exhibition, as well as mileage, excursion or commutation passenger tickets.

Section 21 relates to the appropriation that is asked to be made.

Mr. President, I have undertaken to state specifically the provisions of the bill in detail, with a mere suggestion of the reasons for each section of the bill.

I am led to believe that the bill as it stands is perhaps a more perfect bill on this subject than has ever been introduced in the Congress of the United States before. There may be many suggestions of amendment by honorable Senators during the consideration of the bill; and if any Senator has any suggestions of amendment to make, of course it is within the privilege of the Senate to adopt them; but I am very anxious that this bill shall be as promptly considered as possible and as promptly acted upon and passed as possible if in the judgment of the Senate it ought to be passed at all.

As the Senate know, this subject has been up for consideration from one term of Congress to another almost time out of mind, until the people of the United States have come almost to believe that there is no real purpose on the part of Congress to do anything more than introduce and report bills and discuss them awhile and then let them die before any final action is reached upon them.

I said in the outset that in my judgment there is no public question before the American people to-day about which there is greater unanimity of sentiment than there is upon the proposition that the Congress of the United States ought to enact some law looking to the regulation of commerce among the several States, and I trust without taking up the time of the Senate longer that every Senator will give attention to this subject until we can pass some bill and get it to the other branch of Congress in the hope that before this session adjourns we shall get some legislation on this subject that will be of some service to the people and reasonably satisfy the public expectations.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I expect to give my vote to this bill, not because its scope is all that I could approve, but because I regard it as looking in the right direction and because I trust that its operation will educate and prepare for more comprehensive legislation.

The necessity for the enactment of this measure recalls an Oriental tale which lingers in my memory from boyhood: Some fishermen one day drew to the shore in their nets a chest from which sounds proceeded, and on listening the sounds became articulate and intelligible. In reply to their questions a voice told them that its possessor was a dwarf endowed with wondrous powers, that he had been imprisoned by a wicked Genie, and if they would release him he could and would labor for them and enrich them. They forced open the lid and there emerged a misshapen being, black, feeble, and unattractive. Its docility and intelligence were remarkable. It showed the greatest eagerness to serve them. As its strength increased it brought coal, precious stones, and fragrant woods from the mountains, and fish and amber and coral from the sea. It evinced such capacity, tact, and tractability that they reasoned if he did so well as he was what would he do if they could increase his strength and stature.

Acting on this idea, they fostered him, brought the most nutritious food for him, and did everything they thought would conduce to the desired end. He thrived, and grew apace. He expanded, became erect, and in time towered above them all. Then there came a change in his demeanor, and instead of being their servant and benefactor, showing them hidden sources of wealth and teaching them how to cheapen the necessaries of life and multiply its luxuries, he proclaimed himself their master and compelled them to bring to him for his use gems, spices, and costly bales, and assumed all the pomp, circumstance, luxury, cruelty, and rapacity of an Indian prince.

THE BENEFICENCE OF RAILROADS.

Among the servants of our civilization none have approached in efficiency the railway. It has annihilated distance; it has not only made the wilderness blossom as the rose, but also has enabled the rose to be readily exchanged for the products of cities. It has conduced to the widest diffusion of labor and rendered nations measurably homogeneous. In our own country the cost of transportation of a year's food from the agricultural west to the seaboard has been reduced to the price of a day's labor, so that the mechanic of the manufacturing centers may by the sacrifice of a single holiday be said to practically live by the side of the farm.

It has rendered possible the establishment of great manufactories at centers of population, where labor is abundant and capital present to superintend, instead of the former necessity of placing the manufactory at the point of supply of raw material. The natural advantages of production in each locality have, by minimizing the cost of transportation, been allowed to be exercised to their utmost, and values added to cereals in remote and isolated districts. The surplus corn of the Northwest, which was formerly so cheap as to be used for fuel, has, by reduced transportation, been enabled to compete with that raised near the seaboard. Ores are profitably shipped from the mountain fastnesses, where a plant is undesirable, to Saint Louis, Detroit, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh, for reduction.

Frederick List, in urging upon Germany a necessity for developing a railroad system in 1841, mentions among others the following advantages:

First. As a means of national defense, it facilitates the concentration, distribution, and direction of the army.

Second. It is a means for the improvement of the culture of the nation, as it facilitates the distribution and promotes the rapidity of distribution of all literary products and the results of the arts and sciences. It brings talent and knowledge and skill of every kind to market, increases the means of education and instruction of each individual and each class and age.

Third. It secures the community against dearth and famine, and against excessive fluctuations in the necessaries of life.

Fourth. It promotes the hygienic condition of the community, as it destroys the distance between the sufferer and his means of cure.

Fifth. It promotes sectional intercourse, and brings friend to friend, relative to relative.

Sixth. It promotes the spirit of the nation, as it has a tendency to destroy the Philistine spirit arising from isolation and provincial prejudice and vanity.

Seventh. It binds nations by ligaments and promotes an interchange of food and commodities, thus making it in effect to be a unit. The iron rails become the nerve of a system which on the one hand strengthens public opinion and on the other strengthens the power of the state for police and governmental purposes.

PRIMITIVE METHODS OF TRANSPORTATION.

It is within the lives of most of us that man was mainly dependent for the transportation of material and product for exchange or use upon water ways, natural and artificial. Primitive man was necessarily limited for the supply of all his wants to his immediate neighborhood. Shepherds and hunters moved in circumscribed areas, and it is probable that the exchange of products by personal intercourse was their only relief from self-supply. When man abandoned nomadic life and became a hewer of wood and drawer of water he sought a fixed habitation, where the wood, either hewn or crude, could be easily floated to its destination.

The first great commercial people, the Phœnicians, built no roads, but carried letters to and impressed their civilization on all the tribes, cities, and nations bordering upon the Mediterranean and Red Seas. The Persians built but limited roadways for commerce. The Romans were the first to appreciate the value of a vast system of roads to secure the permanency of their conquests and fasten their civilization on peoples rendered subject.

The conquered provinces were retained by her because she gave more than she took away, and chief among the benefits conferred was her system of roads. The history of the intellectual and commercial progress of Europe will show that its earliest and fullest development was along the line of the old military roads. They were not only the arteries of the empire, but also the conduits through which the wealth of the world flowed to Rome. They were the tentacles which grasped her territory and transmitted to and took from the Eternal City intelligence of the status of the provinces, political and otherwise. The saying that "all roads lead to Rome" was an epigrammatic assertion of her universal dominion.

The Incas of Peru developed a nation of thirty millions of people by establishing speedy intercommunication with all districts as soon as subjected by means of roads radiating from Cuzco, one of which was 1,000 Spanish leagues long, 20 feet broad, and built of heavy flags of freestone.

From the days of the Cæsars until the present, the substantial, the intellectual, and the moral progress of districts and of peoples has been clearly measured by their facilities for commerce, by canals, by improved water ways, and by substantial highways. The possibilities of exchange have been enlarged and the transfer of the best product of each people to the others has carried with it an elevation of laws, of manners, and of customs. The introduction of steam as a motor to ships and carriages has multiplied opportunities of development without changing the great commercial laws affecting the progress of mankind.

Railways and steamboat routes are improved highways, not a new but a developed feature of the advancement of the race. The question at the front to-day in this country and in Europe is not how to cripple or restrict railroad building or railroad operations; is not how to do away with the vast commercial power, extending over 265,000 miles of rails laid through developed and developing territory, but how best to promote them, that they may continue to serve rather than to rule the interests of individuals and communities.

REGULATION OF RAILROADS IN EUROPE.

That the experience of a little more than half a century under various conditions and under every civilized form of government has not been sufficient to remove the regulation of railways from the field of experiment is shown by the various methods of to-day on trial in Europe and America. In Belgium the government has either built or purchased the main trunk lines of the kingdom. Branch lines are allowed to be built and operated by private capital, the government guaranteeing 4 per cent. interest upon the investment and retaining the practical supervision of the management.

The competition of the canals and of the government lines, together with the obligations of the governmental guarantee, would seem to provide a system of checks and balances most desirable. It is reported that the roads are managed satisfactorily to the people, that the rates are fixed and stable; but an early absorption by the government under provisions in the charters of the private lines is predicted, which would indicate a dissatisfaction on the part of private capitalists.

In France the main trunk lines were originally assigned a district or field supposed to be profitable without competition on condition that they should build branch lines into the less productive districts. This proved impracticable, and the government was obliged to lend its aid for the development of the territory. The charters provide that at the expiration of ninety years all railways should revert to the state, the state purchasing the rolling-stock at an actual valuation. Already the government has advanced 600,000,000 francs to the railways, and its policy looks toward an earlier appropriation than that nominated in the charters.

Already a perpetual committee supervises the management, arranges the tariff of charges, and settles disputes between competing lines and between the public and the railways. Rates and time-cards are required to be published, and no change against the interests of forwarders or passengers can be made without thirty days' notice and the consent of the commission. No private arrangements with individuals or corporations are permitted.

In North Germany all concessions are made by the minister of commerce, unless there is to be a largess or guarantee of interest when an act is required. In Prussia, at the commencement of its railway system, each railway chartered was given a field without competition, the state reserving the right of purchase of the road after the lapse of thirty years. In 1882 there were 9,500 miles of State lines, 1,320 miles of private lines under state management, and 2,400 miles of private lines. The control of the government may be considered practically absolute, and is given over to a special board at the head of which is the minister of public works. Special tariffs are prohibited, correspondence in time-cards in railways insisted upon, persons and merchandise conveyed in the order in which the application is made. No variation in rates or time-table can be had without the consent of the board.

Austria followed the course of France in allowing concessions for the period of ninety years, and in addition the government built several trunk lines, which it retains. It also maintains supervision over passenger and freight traffic. Switzerland has no state lines, but an effectual system of supervising the tariff charges and a perpetual commission to regulate the relations of the corporations to the stockholders and the public, and provide for the constant publicity of railway transactions. Italy owns a portion of its railways and is in negotiation for the remainder. The policy of the government is ownership by the state.

In the history of English legislation on railroads and its results we find the closest resemblance to our own. In 1836 England had, next to Holland, the most complete canal system and service in the world, and its restrictive endeavors were guided not by a proper conception of the problem before it, but by its experience in dealing with oppressive methods in canal management. The popular belief in the power of competition to cheapen rates and control commerce in the public interest was accepted, and in spite of the warning of the astute Morrison and the terse axiomatic statement of George Stephenson, that "where combination is possible competition is impossible," their early legislation was bent to increase competition between capitalists.

The natural consequences of combination, discrimination, secret-rate making, preferences, the building up of seaports, and the oppression of non-competing points followed in spite of the most stringent legislation, until, in 1872, after over 3,300 acts had been passed and the expenditure of about £80,000,000 imposed upon the companies, a joint select committee recommended and Parliament provided for a railway commission, which has since become permanent and been increased in executive and judicial power. The salaries of the commissioners are £3,000 each, and some progress has been made in the regulation of the interests of the general public.

RAILROAD MILEAGE OF THE WORLD.

The following table, taken from Spofford's Almanac for 1883, gives the statistics of the railways of the world to January 1, 1881:

RAILROADS OF THE UNITED STATES.

According to the statement of H. R. Hobart, editor of the Railway Age, made before the Senate committee, the railway mileage of the United States and Territories at the commencement of 1885 was about 125,500 miles. This is the aggregate of distances between points on railroads, without taking cognizance of double or side tracks. The capital stock and bonded indebtedness show a value of $7,795,000,000, or more than four times the national debt, and 20 per cent. of the estimated wealth of the entire country. They employ about 725,000 persons, and thus support directly more than 3,000,000 of men, women, and children; and indirectly they aid in supporting many millions more concerned in the manufacturing, mercantile, and other interests of which the railways are very large patrons.

These figures appear magnified when the short period of their growth is considered. In 1828 there were 3 miles of railroad; in 1830, 41 miles; in 1840, 2,200 miles; in 1850, 7,500 miles; in 1860, 29,000 miles; in 1870, 49,000 miles; in 1880, 93,671 miles. These are the modern highways for commerce, and should differ only in extent and facilities from their predecessors back to the days of the Roman roads. The laws governing the Roman highways were the bases of the laws of the road to this day. They were built by sovereigns having the right of eminent domain, and their use was common and equal to all. They were supported by taxes upon the bordering people, or by tolls upon those who made use of them.

Under our somewhat complicated system of government the railroads were chartered by States, who bestowed upon them the right of eminent domain, and they were builded wholly or in part by contributions directly from the State or by the people along their line, and they were intended for the common and equal service of all who chose to make use of them. In their inception they were supposed to bear an analogy to the canal, and traces of this mistake appear in almost all of the early charters. It was believed that the railway, like the toll-roads of that day, would be built by one company and used by any and all who chose to prepare suitable carriages.

The charter of the Ithaca and Owego Railroad contains the following language:

Sec. 12. All persons paying the toll aforesaid may, with suitable and proper carriages, use and travel upon the said railroad subject to such rules and regulations as said corporators are authorized to make by the ninth section of this act.

Special charters were the rule up to the passage of a general act, regarded as a convenience, by the Legislature of New York, which was imitated by the other States, and in the acceptance of some provision of which nearly if not quite all of the roads holding special charters have brought themselves under its general provisions.

Liberal legislation and a speculative spirit among our people led to overbuilding and misbuilding, and upon emerging from the crisis of 1857 many railroads found themselves embarrassed and the mortgages upon them were foreclosed.

ORIGIN AND RESULT OF STOCK WATERING.

At this time, under a system of reorganization which appeared plausible and just to the people, to the stockholders, and to those holding other than first-mortgage claims, bankruptcy was given a novel and dangerous turn in railrord financiering, and "additional capitalization," discounted upon the markets of the world, paved the way for the absolute control of this vast value and interest by a handful of men irresponsible to the people for the condition and conduct of their highways.

To-day it is represented that half a dozen gentlemen meeting in an office on Wall street may, by the power derived from ownership in these railways and wealth not obtained by the development of the country or improved transportation but by financial jugglery, dictate the profits or losses of men and communities throughout the land. By their fiat Rochester must stop milling that Minneapolis may thrive. All manufacturing establishments at Niagara Falls save one must suspend that the one may become wealthy. The capital and labor invested in thousands of oil wells and refineries must be lost that one combination may be made powerful. Villages and cities as well as individuals have been selected for development or for destruction. Mr. Charles

Francis Adams, formerly of the Massachusetts commission, now president of the Union Pacific Railroad, before a committee of the Federal Congress in 1880, says:

I must ask you to dismiss all preconceptions from your minds and to fairly consider what is the real cause of the inequality, the injustice, the discriminations of the existing railroad service, those ills of the body-politic for which you are now undertaking to prescribe. I will not stop to dwell upon them or denounce them. It is not necessary to do so, for I hold them to be proven and their existence notorious. The record is full of evidence on the subject. We all know, every one knows, that discriminations in the railroad treatment and charges do exist between individuals and between places. We all know that the railroad tariffs fluctuate wildly, not only in different years, but in different seasons of the same year. We know that certain large business firms, the leviathans of modern business, can and do dictate their own terms between rival corporations, while the small concern must accept the best terms it can get.

It is beyond dispute that business is carried hither and thither to this point, away from that point, and through the other point; not because it would naturally go to, away from, or through those points, but because the rates are made on an artificial basis to serve ulterior ends. In regard to these things I regard the existing system nearly as bad as any system can be. Studying its operations as I have long and patiently, I am ready now to repeat what I have repeatedly said before, that the most surprising thing about it to me is that the business community sustains itself under such conditions. The principles of law governing common carriers are habitually violated; special contracts covering long periods of time are made every day with heavy shippers under which a common carrier, whose first duty it is to serve all equally, gives to certain parties a practical control of the markets. There is thus neither equality nor system, law nor equity, in the matter of railroad charges. A complete change in this respect is a condition precedent to any equitable system of railroad transportation.

DISCRIMINATION.

The Senate committee, whose investigations have resulted in the presentation of this bill, present in their report eighteen specific causes of complaint against the railroad system, which may nearly all be epitomized as "discrimination" in one form or another. They cite among the many instances the case of the Standard Oil Company, which has been enabled by railroad discrimination to practically control the oil supply of the continent, and who are reported to have realized $10,000,000 in a single season from diminished freights alone.

A single instance, given on page 199 of the report, is sufficient to condemn the system. It appears that the company operates the Macksburg pipe line which carries oil to the Cleveland and Marietta Railroad. This road was in the hands of a receiver, who was removed by Judge Baxter upon the investigation of the rates charged for the transportation of oil. It was found that he was charging all independent shippers 35 cents per barrel, and the rate to the pipe line was but 10 cents. It appears that the Standard Oil Company owned the pipes through which the oil is conveyed from wells owned by individuals, with the exception of certain pipes owned and used by one George Rice, carrying oil from his wells, and to get rid of this competition the assistance of the receiver was sought and obtained.

The company offered to give the railroad three thousand dollars' worth of business each month, while Rice could give but three hundred dollars' worth. If its demands were not complied with it threatened to extend its pipe line from Macksburg to Marietta, on the Ohio River. What those demands were was stated as follows in a letter filed by the receiver as part of his defense:

The Standard Oil Company threatens to store and afterward pipe all oils under its control unless you make the following arrangements, namely: You shall make a uniform rate of 35 cents per barrel for all persons except the Standard Oil Company. You shall charge them 10 cents per barrel for their oil, and also pay them 25 cents per barrel out of the 35 cents per barrel collected of other shippers.

THE RELIEF PROPOSED BY THIS BILL.

It is not necessary to multiply instances. The able report of the committee, with the testimony taken at fairly selected and widely distributed points, is before each Senator for his information. The bill, judiciously drawn and based upon the information impartially obtained, may be epitomized as legislating upon five points concerning which it appears to me that no disinterested difference of opinion can exist.

First. It provides that all charges shall be reasonable and just.

Second. That unjust discrimination shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by a penalty against the corporation and a personal penalty against the officer willfully violating.

Third. That facilities shall be furnished without unjust discrimination under similar penalties.

Fourth. Charging more for a shorter than a longer distance in the same direction shall be presumptive evidence of unjust discrimination which may be rebutted by the carrier, and the commission may establish rules to regulate this.

Fifth. That the rates and regulations shall be made public in such a manner as the commission shall prescribe, and ten days' notice is required of any advance in rates. The rates so established shall not be varied from, and violation shall subject the carrier to mandamus upon the relation of the commission and to an injunction to restrain further violation.

QUALIFICATIONS OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

For the carrying out and enforcement of these provisions, with authority to require reports and investigate all complaints and with power to proceed in the courts to enforce the law, a commission is provided, and upon the character and efficiency of this commission would seem to depend the real and specific value of the legislation. Holding in mind the fact that the estimated wealth of this nation is divided between the railroad corporations and all other property-owners in the proportion of 1 to 5; that the 20 per cent. represented in railways has become concentrated under the control of men who may be counted upon the ten fingers, while the 80 per cent. is diffused among individuals and companies of diverse interests; that our present action is taken because of the oppression of the 80 per cent. by the organized 20 per cent., it would seem that we fall short of our duty if by the terms of this bill we prevent the employment of the best talent attainable to represent the interests of the people.

This commission will be regarded as the people's attorneys, and should be composed of men at least the equals in legal acumen and practical force of those whose unjust schemes they are expected to thwart and whose unprecedented powers they are designed to direct. Concentrated capital never mistakes cheapness in the employment of its agents for economy, and salaries of from $12,000 to $25,000 for those intrusted with the business management of railways are not uncommon. This bill provides that the commissioners shall have no other business and that the main office shall be in Washington, thus necessitating or indicating a residence here and an income limited to the amount named in the bill. On this account I urge upon Senators and the committee having the bill in charge the serious consideration of an amendment of section 15 increasing the amount of compensation.

I do not expect that the passage of this bill and the appointment of any five gentlemen who might be named under its provisions for its enforcement will at once bring the millennium to American transportation. For forty years a constant struggle of wits has been going on between the grasping corporations and Legislatures endeavoring to restrain them, and to-day we are confronted with successful, legalized wrongs remaining uncontrolled and unredressed. But we shall have done our duty when we shall have done our utmost for the future security of the people. I do not believe that this bill will accomplish radical results, but it is a step in the right direction, both for the people and for honest railroad management. For many years a contest between the safe-maker and the burglar has been waged. Each failure of the safe to withstand its robber has begotten improvements believed to be final, and each in turn has yielded to human cunning and ingenuity. But it is not for the safe-maker to stop in his endeavors. If this bill becoming a law should fail utterly to supply a remedy, another attempt must be made. If it is partially successful, we shall have accomplished something and new remedies will be suggested by its partial failure.

THE COMPLAINT OF THE PEOPLE.

An examination of the report and testimony will not show that railroad corporations are making too much money, or that the average rates of transportation are too high. On the other hand they have been in the main unprofitable, and transportation between competing points in America is the cheapest in the world. The complaint of the people is of discrimination, uncertainty, and secret injury. The complaint of investors is that two-sevenths of the capitalized investment is water, and that through inside combinations the masters of Wall street are able to realize vast profits upon railroad wreckage and the depreciation of railroad property, as well as upon their prudent conduct and honest management. A great stride toward personal liberty was believed to have been made when our Government was organized with the prohibition of entail; but the sovereignty of trunk lines and railroad systems, imperishable as they are, present a more dangerous imperium in imperio for our consideration than the largest entailed interests of the world.

RAILROADS SERVANTS, NOT MASTERS.

Railroads are beneficent servants, but they must not become masters. The dwarf has grown large enough for us to impose restrictions upon his growth, else the old fable will be illustrated in practical life. If unchecked he bids fair to develop into an Afrite of gigantic stature and overwhelming and malignant influence. Railroads are no longer dull, insensate things. They are imbued with intelligence, and an intelligence that neither slumbers nor sleeps. They are no longer joint stock companies alone; they are dynasties.

They are already outlined, and in a few years if not supervised and controlled by legislation they will have become as firmly fixed in their grasp upon continued power, commercial, social, and political, as the Hapsborgs, the Hohenzollerns, or the Guelphs. These reigning houses were born of force. They were the triumph of the strong over the weak. These modern dynasties will have been born of law and of concession and will be the triumph of the creature over the creator.

The old cry of the mayor of the palace when he appeared at the window of the Tuilleries, "The king is dead, long live the king," may well be proclaimed when the railroad magnate goes to his long home. Not a schedule is changed, not a locomotive puffs less fircely, not a sardine less is sold in the restaurant. The same intelligence, fortified and intensified possibly by new blood, wields the scepter and utters its mandates.

The fact that the stock changes hands does not detract from its power or alter its purposes. It is more remorseless than man, for the responsibility is divided. The cabinet or ministers who shape its policy and carry out its behests justify their course by the plea of necessity, and feel no tremors of conscience from the fact that their personality is merged in that of the corporation.

SPECIAL PRIVILEGES FOR NONE—EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ALL.

Hitherto content has come to the plain people of our land, to the mechanic, to the farmer, to the artisan, because, as he sat by his hearth noting the progress of his fellows who had outstripped him in life's race, his eye turned to the bright boy and the laughing girl with a knowledge that to them America offered every possibility of culture, wealth, and power. He knew that the history of the men whom America had delighted to honor had shown that from the humblest beginnings nothing restricted or directed the development of the American citizen outside of himself. To-day he sees the price of his labor determined not from his surroundings. He sees his village built up or destroyed by a foreign will. He sees the value of his little property decreased and that of the property of his fellow in an adjoining village increased without the action of either and beyond the control of any. He sees his neighbor, by secret arrangement with the railroad company, increasing his store with no extra labor or display of energy or ability, while his fellows are correspondingly depressed.

These things it is the object of this measure to correct.

All the American citizen has asked in the past or will ask in the future is a fair chance; no odds of the Government, but its protection, for which his life is pledged, and its schools, for which his money is paid. Special privileges for none, equal rights for all.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to ask a question about one amendment which has been adopted. On page 14, in section 12, line 20, my memorandum has it an amendment was adopted inserting "and to the satisfaction of the party or parties complaining." I ask the Senator from Illinois if the word "and," at the beginning of line 20, should not be "or," because by that language you have first to satisfy the commission and get their judgment and then satisfy the parties afterward?

Mr. CULLOM. I am not sure but that the Senator is right. If the complainant is satisfied, of course the matter ends. I have no objection to that change.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that that change be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator send it up in writing?

Mr. CULLOM. It is only a suggestion to change the word "and," at the beginnig of line 20 of section 12, to the word "or;" so as to read:

In compliance with the report and notice of the commission, or to the satisfaction of the party or parties complaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the modification will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Iowa to allow me to present some amendments to the pending bill and to have them printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the bill which has been under consideration be printed as amended, so that we may have it in its present state as proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate the 14th day of April, 1886.

POSTMASTERS.

Frederick A. Ross, to be postmaster at Tuscumbia, Ala., vice John C. Goodloe, jr., to be removed.

H. C. Briley, to be postmaster at Dell Rapids, Dak., vice Albert C. Folsom, resigned.

Jacob P. Kerlin, to be postmaster at Warren, Ill., vice H. C. Gann, to be removed.

W. C. Camp, to be postmaster at Guthrie Centre, Iowa, vice William Holsman, term expired.

Philip B. Spence, to be postmaster at Newport, Ky., vice Mary L. Ross, term expired.

William B. Beck, to be postmaster at Tekamah, Nebr., vice Peter F. Peterson, resigned.

Francis G. Boswell, to be postmaster at Phelps, N. Y., vice Samuel S. Partridge, term expired.

James P. Owen, to be postmaster at Camden, N. Y., vice Heman Snow, resigned.

John Shaw, to be postmaster at Van Wert, Ohio, vice David P. Dunathan, whose removal, for cause, is proposed.

James F. Robertson, to be postmaster at Culpeper, Va., vice John C. Bell, to be removed.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 29, 1886.

COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Samuel J. Tilden, jr., of New York, to be collector of internal revenue for the fifteenth district of New York.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance, and ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 863) of Samuel J. Tilden, jr., of New York, to be collector of internal revenue for the fifteenth district of New York, in place of James S. Smart, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. Tilden is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of James S. Smart, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 16, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of James S. Smart, late collector of internal revenue for the fifteenth district of New York, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions. But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committtee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

A resolution, as follows, was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Finance, April 6, 1886, in relation to this and all similar letters to the foregoing:

"Resolved, That the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance, dated March 16, 1886, or subsequently, in relation to the suspension of collectors of internal revenue, should be received and held as honest declarations made in good faith that there are no charges or papers on file in the Department reflecting in any manner against their moral or official conduct or character."

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Tilden.

George A. Wilson, of Illinois, to be collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Illinois.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance, and ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 1287) of George A. Wilson, of Illinois, to be collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Illinois, in place of Howard Knowles, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. Wilson is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Howard Knowles, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 16, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of Howard Knowles, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Illinois, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions. Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Wilson.

Maurice Kelly, of Illinois, to be collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Illinois.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance, and ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 849) of Maurice Kelly, of Illinois, to be collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Illinois, in place of Richard Rowett suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. Kelly is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Richard Rowett, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Kelly.

William B. Anderson, of Illinois, to be collector of internal revenue for the thirteenth district of Illinois.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance, and ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD.

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 847) of William B. Anderson, of Illinois, to be collector of internal revenue for the thirteenth district of Illinois, in place of Charles W. Pavey, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. Anderson is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Charles W. Pavey, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Anderson.

Frank Schlaudecker, of Pennsylvania, to be collector of internal revenue for the nineteenth district of Pennsylvania.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance, and ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 1308) of Frank Schlaudecker, of Pennsylvania, to be collector of internal revenue for the nineteenth district of Pennsylvania, in place of Jacob F. Walther suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. Schlaudecker is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Jacob F. SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 16, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of Edward H. Chase, late collector of internal revenue for the twelfth district of Pennsylvania, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions. But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

A resolution, as follows, was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Finance, April 6, 1886, in relation to this and all similar letters to the foregoing:

"Resolved, That the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance, dated March 16, 1886, or subsequently, in relation to the suspension of collectors of internal revenue, should be received and held as honest declarations made in good faith that there are no charges or papers on file in the Department reflecting in any manner against their moral or official conduct or character."

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Staples.

John T. McGonigle, of Pennsylvania, to be collector of internal revenue for the ninth district of Pennsylvania.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance, and ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 1306) of John T. McGonigle, of Pennsylvania, to be collector of internal revenue for the ninth district of Pennsylvania, in place of Andrew J. Kauffman, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. McGonigle is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Andrew J. Kauffman, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1886.

Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

A resolution, as follows, was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Finance, April 6, 1886, in relation to this and all similar letters to the foregoing:

"Resolved, That the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance, dated March 17, 1886, or subsequently, in relation to the suspension of collectors of internal revenue, should be received and held as honest declarations made in good faith that there are no charges or papers on file in the Department reflecting in any manner against their moral or official conduct or character."

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Stone.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 14, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THOMAS SYMONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting a statement and papers in support of the claim of Thomas Symons for services as counsel in defending the United States in the case of the Choctaw Nation of Indians in the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill, with the Senate amendments, be printed.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the Senate amendments ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STORM, until Tuesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. GOFF, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, until the 1st of May, on account of important business.

To Mr. BURLEIGH, for one week, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. MCRAE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1476) to amend the act of Congress approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin;"

A bill (S. 633) to change the name of Uniontown to Anacostia;

A bill (S. 1125) granting a pension to Noah Nelson;

A bill (S. 349) for the promotion of anatomical science, and to prevent the desecration of graves; and

A bill (S. 761) granting a pension to William Webster.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TURNER rose and was recognized.

Mr. TURNER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], who desires to make a report.

FORFEITURE OF LAND GRANTS.

Mr. MORRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to present the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules has had under consideration several propositions intended to facilitate the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands relating to the forfeiture of land grants, speculation in the public lands, and the reservation of public lands for actual and bona fide settlers, and in lieu of all the matter referred to it reports the resolution hereto attached and recommends its adoption:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands shall have leave at any time during the present session, after the morning hour and the hour for the consideration of bills reported by committees, to consider, in the order in which they stand on the Calendar, bills for the forfeiture of land grants to railroad and other corporations, bills preventing speculation in the public lands, and bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual bona fide settlers; the same not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman calls the previous question I wish to inquire whether the terms "corporations," as used in the report, would embrace the States. Some of these bills cover grants made to States for the benefit of railroad corporations.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is intended to reach the bills already reported by the Committee on Public Lands and referred to the House Calendar. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will probably remember that when the Committee on Rules reported a code or system of rules an amendment was made by the House giving to the Committee on Public Lands the right to report at any time. In the exercise of that right the committee has permitted some of its bills to go on the House Calendar, and the committee now complains that its members are unable to reach the bills so referred to or placed on the House Calendar by them, and the Committee on Rules has reported this resolution to enable such bills to be reached and considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I apprehend, however, that it will be found that some of those bills are bills declaring the forfeiture of lands granted not to corporations directly, but to States for the benefit of such corporations.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I did not understand the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. My question was whether the term "corporations," as used in this report, is broad enough to cover the States, because in some instances lands have been granted to States for the benefit of corporations.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The term "corporation" is usually broad enough in this House to cover the whole business. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state (if the gentleman from Indiana will permit) that the language of this resolution describing the character of bills embraced by it is precisely the language used in the rule as it now stands, which was adopted by the House, giving the Committee on Public Lands the right to report at any time.

Mr. MORRISON. And written by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The SPEAKER. In other words, the resolution gives the right to have considered precisely the same character of bills which the committee has the right to report at any time.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think "corporations" is broad enough to cover everything.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a point of order. Can this resolution be printed and go over?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes that point——

Mr. DUNHAM. I make the point.

Mr. RANDALL. It comes rather late.

The SPEAKER. Although the point raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] would have been good if raised earlier, the Chair thinks the point made on the other side that the question is made too late must, if insisted on, be sustained, as the resolution has now been considered.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not delay the passage of a resolution designed to facilitate the consideration of these bills of forfeiture.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire that this resolution shall go over and be printed, so that we may understand perfectly what it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is certainly too late to make the point now.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point that the question of order of the gentleman from Illinois comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the point of the gentleman from Illinois is made too late, as the resolution has been considered and discussed.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to accept an amendment to this resolution so as to provide that this order of business shall not take precedence of prior orders.

Mr. MORRISON. I am not authorized to accept any amendment, but I do not object to the gentleman from Texas offering an amendment. I move the previous question on the report and the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Judge REAGAN], which may be considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], as the Chair understands, moves to insert the words "prior orders" before the words "revenue or general appropriation bills." The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question upon agreeing to the amendment and adopting the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. REAGAN, it was agreed to; there being—ayes, 75, noes 16.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask that they be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4690) to equalize the right of fishing in the navigable waters of the United States which border on any State or Territory; and to ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it involves an important legal question.

There being no objection, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of House bill 4690, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 22) for the relief of Martin Murphy and P. B. Murphy; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

ELECTION CONTEST—HURD VS. ROMEIS.

Mr. TURNER. I now call up the contested-election case on which the House was engaged yesterday.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield twelve minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, the contested-election case of Hurd vs. Romeis has attracted general attention all over the country, and its disposition is a matter of public interest. Occurring as it did in the memorable political reconnaissance in force, as it were, in Ohio, just preceding the national election of 1884, the marked political views of Mr. Hurd as an advocate of free trade rendered his canvass somewhat conspicuous, and the unfavorable result to him, and the succeeding contest, have all tended to keep alive public interest in the subject. Notwithstanding the record is not a very voluminous one, yet circumstances were such as to justify two arguments of the case before the Committee on Elections, and now the case comes before the House upon these reports from different segments of the committee, each differing from the other, the majority holding that Mr. Romeis is entitled to retain his seat, a report from four of the minority holding that Mr. Hurd was legally elected, and a second report from two of the minority holding that neither was elected and relegating the question back to the people.

The tenth Congressional district of Ohio is composed of the counties of Erie, Sandusky, Ottawa, and Lucas, in the latter of which is the active and commercial city of Toledo. Upon the face of the returns the sitting member was elected by a majority of 239. In the notice of contest a great many causes and specifications were assigned, but the whole case turns upon the evidence relating to the following four subjects:

1. Precinct B, ward 8, Toledo.
2. Precinct C, ward 3, Toledo.
3. Kelley's Island precinct, Erie County.
4. And about 220 illegal votes alleged to have been cast in Toledo.

It may be mentioned as an unusual circumstance in contests of this character that while in his answer the contestee set up charges of various kinds of quite as severe a character affecting the canvass of the contestant not an item of evidence has been introduced to support them. There was time, and there was surely occasion, even upon the old apothegm that misery loves company. But the contestant's canvass and the management of the election so far as he is concerned is left untouched and unquestioned. The inference is almost irresistible that it was not vulnerable to successful attack or impeachment. A consideration of the case then brings us to the charges and evidence relating to (1) Precinct B, in ward 8, in Toledo.

The charge made here is twofold: First, that in this precinct the election was tainted with wholesale corruption and bribery sufficient to exclude the vote of the precinct; and, second, that by reason of irregularities and illegalities on the part of the judges and others in counting the ballots and preparing the returns there is such uncertainty as to the vote of that precinct as must cause its rejection from the canvass.

(1) There is no doubt a wide distinction exists between individual bribery among several electors of a precinct and general bribery tainting the whole, so that the pure and unbribed can not be separated from the corrupt and bribed. In the former case the evidence must show individual corruption and for whom the corrupted vote was cast; thereupon it is cast out and eliminated from the count. In the latter case it is not necessary to specify or show the particular individuals corrupted, for that would only eliminate their individual votes; nor is it necessary to show how they voted; but having shown that a large corruption fund was raised, sent into the precinct, and generally distributed, in fact, as a fund to influence voters, the case is made out.

I do not stop to draw any parallel between the English law of elections relative to the agencies of the candidates there and their methods and the laws and methods in operation here. The candidate here who accepts a nomination from a convention under a drilled and disciplined organization, with its Congressional, county, city, ward, and township committees, chairmen, secretaries, &c., and whose whole campaign is managed and conducted by that agency, must be held to have adopted them as his agents, and for all purposes of the public interests should be bound by their conduct in matters of this character. Whenever through these agencies a large fund, sufficient in amount to affect a precinct in a general sense, has been sent into it and used upon it, we are not required to point out the individuals who received it—to segregate the good from the bad. Bribery and corruption will be presumed to have accomplished their intended purposes, and the vote of the precinct must be excluded. Especially will this be the case where the contestee, upon whom such facts cast the burden, makes no effort himself to limit the effects of his own corruption and save the innocent and guiltless from the consequences of his own contaminating conduct.

In the present case, however, while there is some slight evidence in the direction of such corruption, I am forced to hold that, in my judgment, it falls far short of establishing the necessary and essential fact. The only witness who speaks or even gives intimation of the use of any considerable sum of money is a Mr. Gerstmann. It is impossible in the brief space allowed to give anything like a satisfactory analysis of his evidence. It is enough to say that it does not satisfy the mind or give rest to conviction. He claims to have gone to Toledo, under the supervision or direction of the national Republican committee, "just to look about, to see how the campaign was progressing, how matters looked, not to look after any particular element; just to go through Ohio and see how matters looked." Then, finally, he puts it, "He was assigned to the German and Polish element." But, while his commission of authority covered the whole State, and he came to Toledo expressly to look after that city, which contains quite a number of precincts, composed very largely of Polanders and Germans, his whole attention seems to have been limited and contracted to this one small precinct of 426 voters. He did not familiarize himself with the wards sufficiently to know them. When he first went there he heard Frank Hurd stood a pretty fair chance, but it could be changed by dealing out a good many kegs of beer—keeping on the good side of fellows. He was not sent as a distributer; only to take a view and report. "Some said a pretty big amount would change things; some less; to approximate it, $2,000 or $3,000." He reported to headquarters it would require financial aid; did not go into details in what way it would require it; "presume they understood it at headquarters what for." He had a talk at New York with Mr. Elkins, who sent him out. "They could not give the funds to him, as it would be a bad precedent. It must come forward through the committee." They said "the election in that district was of national importance, owing to Hurd's free-trade teachings." The conversation lasted about ten minutes. He supposed the fund was to go through the State committee. Mr. Elkins said, "You go ahead, and tell the State committee to do all they can."

Some five or six days before the election this witness went back to Toledo and found a change. They were then all for Romeis; had no need for him, the witness. From the conversation he had with these people, and "from the change of their feelings and countenances he could see, he supposed, that their desires had been satisfied, or something that way. Of course the people did not come expressly out, but from that he could infer that something was done to poison their minds or their ideas, and that can be done only with money, he supposes. Without stopping to note that he mentions the name of no people or locality where or from whom he obtained information, that his own account of himself is not as satisfactory as it should be, and that he is flatly contradicted by about the only person named by him as to circumstances and conversations between them, it is to be observed that he has no knowledge whatever that any sum of money was ever sent by the national committee, the State committee, or any other committee or agency. He makes no pretense that he saw or learned of any money used, distributed, or paid for treating; saw no kegs of beer. He gives no statements, confessions, or admissions of people to the effect that improper methods had been resorted to; and his inferences from conversations not repeated or stated, looks not described, and jargonings that were unintelligible even to himself, are as incompetent as evidence as they were probably unwarranted in fact. Now, when to the above I add the testimony of Louis Jahn, we will have the entire evidence relating to wholesale bribery. It is as follows:

22. Q. What, if anything, do you know about money being paid to voters there that day after the election?

A. Much as I know was about nineteen ticket peddlers around there, and Henry Gates paid them off the same night in Joe Boldt's grocery.

Whether the witness intended to give this as his own personal knowledge or did not understand the distinction between a narration of events which had been told him by others, it appeared very distinctly further on in his evidence that he had no personal knowledge of the transaction whatever, and that the whole foundation for his answer was a statement made to him some three weeks after the election by Henry Gates, a chairman of the Republican ward committee, to the effect that on the evening of the election he (Gates) had paid off some nineteen ticket peddlers, at from $5 to $10 each. While even this statement is not wholly uncontradicted, yet its competency is so certainly challenged, that it seems useless to dwell upon the consideration of its weight or effect. I have given it my most careful attention and find it impossible to hold it competent. Conceding all that is claimed in the matter of Gates's original agency in the campaign organization, and even that for some purposes that agency may have continued after the day of election, yet the conversation between Gates and Jahn was not in the exercise of any agency on the part of Gates.

The interview was not a business one; had no relation to accomplishing or perfecting any feature of the election or its result, but was simply a casual meeting and talk between two acquaintances; and the statement alleged to have been made by Gates was so entirely and purely a narrative of a past event that it is mere hearsay and incompetent. Some cases are cited from English authorities in cases of elections where declarations of individuals subsequent to the events and in explanation of them have been allowed. But they are required to be sufficiently recent and so naturally connected with the general bribery itself as to spring from it, and to be competent as showing a state of corruption at the day of the election. It proceeds upon the theory that just as swells and heaving of the waters are indications of a recent storm on the sea so where a community has been corrupted by general bribery its effects and consequences will remain and operate for some little time afterward. The men influenced will meet and talk over the matter, and say and do things with reference to the bribery, its circumstances, &c.; and such talk and conduct have been allowed as evidence under the peculiar system relative to elections there. But so far as I am aware such evidence has never been recognized here. It is for these reasons that I am of opinion this charge of bribery is not established.

(2) The objections to the returns of the election at this precinct is a much more serious subject. The statute of Ohio more immediately applicable to this matter provides—

[SEC. 2956.] At the close of the polls the poll-book shall be signed by the judges and attested by clerks, and the names therein contained shall be counted and the numbers set down at the foot of the poll-books in the manner hereinafter provided in the form of the poll-books.

SEC. 2957. After the poll-books are signed, in the manner hereinafter provided, the ballot-boxes shall be opened, and the ballots therein contained shall be taken out, one at a time, by one of the judges, who shall read aloud distinctly, while the ticket remains in hand, the name or names thereon contained, and then deliver it to the second judge, who shall examine the same and pass it to the third judge, who shall string it on a thread and carefully preserve it, and the same method shall be observed in respect to each of the tickets taken out of the ballot-box until the number taken out of the ballot-box is equal to the number of names in the poll-books; and any ballots in the box in excess of the number of names on the poll-books, together with the ballots strung as aforesaid, shall be deposited in the box and locked, and the box and contents delivered to the officer authorized to receive and keep the key or keys, and the box shall remain locked until the expiration of the time within which any legal notice of contest can be given, and if such notice be given shall remain locked until the trial of such contest.

It will be carefully observed that after the close of the polls and before the ballot-box shall be opened the judges are required to sign the poll-books and the clerks to attest them. The importance of this is obvious. When that record is thus perfected and completed, before the condition and number of ballots in the box are known, it is placed beyond the possibility of manipulation or alteration, unless it shall be open to the observation of all the judges and clerks. Until this is done the judges engaged in receiving votes are ignorant of the condition of the poll-book, and it may be easily changed or altered, tallies changed and balances altered. In the present case the poll-books were not thus signed until after several counts of ballots had been made, with ever-varying result, in total disregard of law. To this day there has never been a legal count of the ballots deposited in that ballot-box. But, on the other hand, everything was done which the statute prohibited to be done, and every opportunity was given for manipulation and substitution of ballots, to avoid which the statute was enacted. Instead of one judge taking out a ballot, announcing it, passing it to the next judge to scrutinize it, and the third stringing it on a string, where it must remain unchangeable for a second or third count if necessary, as required by the statute, the judges poured the ballots out on the table and then counted them in that loose and irregular manner. They then found there were 7 more ballots than there were names of voters on the poll-book. The ballots were again counted, and there were 3 more ballots. They then divided the ballots into straight and scratched tickets, and arranged them in fives, probably crosswise, as bank bills are sometimes counted. A more complete and perfect method to enable parties or bystanders to even up the ballots where there has been addition or subtraction, or to remove from the piles of one class of votes and add to the other a corresponding number, can not be imagined. And it was the success of fraud in just such methods of counting that induced the Legislature of Ohio to enact this statute, which was violated in every particular here. Finding in this count there were 4 ballots short, the judges very complacently divided them by giving to both sides of the ticket 2 imaginary ballots, and then strung the tickets and signed the poll-books. The return thus made of the vote of that precinct is an official document made ex parte, and until impeached is conclusive of the facts stated. But when impeached, shown to be false, as this is conceded to be, it loses its official character and ceases to be evidence. The judges themselves concede that this return is untrue, made so by them knowingly. It contains 2 more votes than were actually cast on each side.

Now, while the return must be excluded and discarded as evidence it is competent for the party to resort to any other competent evidence to show how many votes were actually cast and for whom. It may be done by producing the identical ballots, or proving it by the judges, or in any other proper manner. In this case it is attempted by the simple arithmetical process of striking off of each side 2 votes and accepting the balance as the true vote. Now, if the count had been regular and in accordance with law, and upon the ascertainment of the deficiency of 4 votes the judges had made this return, then that course of correction might be a safe one. But is it not absolutely necessary, after we have discarded the return itself, that we shall place ourselves in the position of the judges of election on that November night, know what they knew, and endeavor to ascertain with the necessary certainty what was the true result?

Well, sir, when we do that we find the judges, who testify, acknowledging that they did not know the result, or how many votes were cast. The return and tally-list as made out shows that adding the 4 votes there, 325 for Romeis and 105 for Hurd, of course omitting the 2 votes each, the vote would be, Romeis, 323; Hurd, 103; total, 426. But the count of votes which makes this result as between Hurd and Romeis, was made after the several previous counts just stated, showing a variation of 11 votes in the total number had been made. It may be said the first count, where there appeared an excess of 7 ballots, and also the next counts, were erroneous, a mistake was made. But no presumption of innocent mistake obtains in a proceeding conducted wholly in violation of law. On the contrary the presumption is that some wrongful purpose was contemplated, that the law was violated to enable the enactment of some such fraud upon the ballot-box which the statute was designed to prevent. Hence the burden rests upon the contestee to show by clear and unequivocal evidence that the ballots, which were finally counted after the several unlawful manipulations in the presence of bystanders, are the identical and unchanged and wholly unsubstituted ballots deposited by the electors, and that as the straight tickets lay piled up in such convenient and suitable shape to enable 25, 50, or 75 straight Democratic tickets to be abstracted and an equivalent number added to the other pile, some such legerdemain was not resorted to. There was a disappearance in some way of 11 ballots.

It is not shown to have been a mere error or discrepancy in count. And while it is true that no witness testified that votes were abstracted or changed, so no witness testified that it was not done or could not be done. No one sees the pickpocket abstract the watch, but this does not disprove that the watch is gone; and yet we have precisely the very ear-marks and indicia of such jugglery and fraud, namely, the illegal emptying of the ballots and placing them in the reach of fraud; piling the tickets into small packages and arranging them for the nimble fingers of fraud; the disappearance of ballots and consequent confusion, and the final declaration of the judges that they did not know how many votes were cast.

Says Louis Jahn, one of the judges:

Q. The certificate did not contain the right number, did it?
A. No, sir; I think not.
Q. Well, after you had given Hurd 2 votes without examining the tickets to see whether he was entitled to them, he had, all told, 105, didn't he?
A. I don't know whether he did or not.
Q. Look at the tally-sheet and see?
A. Well, I couldn't tell that this is the correct number—that this is the votes which he got on the tally-sheets, cause everything was mixed up.
Q. Now, then, before you made that motion (to add 2 votes to each) Hurd had 103 votes, didn't he?
A. Don't know how many he had; couldn't tell; that was the right figure before.
Q. Well, before you made your motion your tally-sheet showed that Romeis and Hurd together had 426 votes, did it not?
A. It did, but that was not the right number of votes; that's where the clerks made mistakes.

The other judges and clerks are equally uncertain and indefinite as to the precise number of votes. But there is no uncertainty or doubt as to the irregular and unlawful conduct in conducting the count and exposing the ballots, the disappearance of ballots, the variation and confusion, and that no lawful count ever was or can be had of the ballots deposited in the box by the electors. It is not the mere discrepancy of 5 or 11 ballots. It is the uncertainty whether the ballots that were finally counted were the actual ballots cast, without which there can be no election. If 5 or 11 ballots changed, how many more were exchanged or substituted? There is the uncertainty—the genuineness of the ballots. And in aid of this uncertainty, developed thus in irregular and unlawful procedure, it may well be pondered if the phenomenal majority secured in this precint by the contestee—280 in a vote of 426, where Hurd has always had a majority of about 70—may not find some explanation quite as satisfactory as the supposed repellant free-trade doctrines of the contestant. While bribery and corruption are not proved to have aided in producing this phenomenal result, in my judgment an uncertainty, pointing in almost as serious a line, destroys the result and deprives the election of result in this precinct.

(2) Precinct C, ward 3, Toledo.

These observations, Mr. Speaker, are all pertinent to the conduct of the judges and third parties in the counting the ballots in Precinct C, ward 3, Toledo. Instead of complying with the statute and counting the ballots one by one out of the box here also, they took them out upon the table, arranged them in piles, and counted them. There is no evidence of variation in the count, or excess of tickets; but that a Mr. Bell, an unauthorized person, interfered with the ballots, put his hand over and took out some of the ballots and placed them on the table to be counted, and had a most excellent opportunity to change tickets is established by a clear preponderance of evidence. If he put in any improper tickets for one side, it only needed for him to succeed in withdrawing as they were piled on the table a corresponding number from the other side to keep the count right with the poll-book.

When charged in the evidence with this unwarranted and unjustifiable conduct, instead of acknowledging the fault and pleading zeal or anxiety to count out the result he denies the charge, alleging that what he did was at another election; but his defense not only fails, but is clearly shown to be untrue. It is a false defense made by one detected in a wrong and illegal act. It is a defense made under oath and persisted in. It is shown that Mr. Bell is a bitter and intense partisan, helps run the machinery in ward politics, has often acted as judge of the election, and knew what the law was, and on this occasion declared that he knew more about the election laws than any twenty men there. Yet he not only interfered with the ballots as stated in manner almost to bring it within the law of felony, but when confronted with the charge he denied it under oath, and thus by evasion and falsehood deprives the original act of the charitable construction of innocent purpose, and invests it with the necessary implication of fraud. It is true that he himself denies changing any votes, yet he is the only one who would know the extent of his own interference, and his statement is no longer reliable or trustworthy. There is nothing said against his personal character; but the plea of character will not avail as against conceded facts, and unfortunately there are said to be localities in Ohio where character seems not to be seriously impaired by sharp political qualifications in either corrupting the voter or manipulating the ballot-box. In any view here was a direct interference, not done through ignorance, but deliberately, and to it can be justly ascribed no other than an improper motive, and it casts a doubt and suspicion upon the genuineness of the ballots, rendering them uncertain.

(3) Kelley's Island precinct.

The consideration of this point in the contest involves a matter of grave importance, and illustrates the imperialism which men of capital are prone to exercise over laboring and dependent men. In this contest to-day it is concreted into the small and insignificant space of an unknown island in Lake Erie; but in the general extent of the pernicious evil thus illustrated it is as widespread as the continent, and it permeates deeper than the waters of that lake. In this case, Norman Kelley, a quarryman, had in his employ about seventy men. Hitherto he had not taken an active part in elections, but on this occasion the profound excitement had finally penetrated his indifference and he became zealous, not generally, but with reference to the laboring men in his employ. He did not go out among his acquaintances to discourse upon the advantages of protection, or to proselyte in so good a cause, but, with that assurance and patronizing countenance of fatherly care which such employers exhibit toward employés, he gave them the strong and cogent argument—a mere opinion—that the adoption of free trade would embarrass his business as a stone-dealer, and in that event he would not require over or to exceed one-half, or probably not one-third, of his present force of men, and he thought the interest of the men was the same as his own. In other words, they were given to understand with perfect distinctness that the election of Hurd and Cleveland would bring free trade, which would compel a reduction of the force, and in that event free-trade men, or men supporting Hurd and Cleveland, would be the first to go. The threat was all the more contemptible because of the thin and unmanly disguise in which it was attempted to be concealed. He did not stop to explain to them that free trade was pernicious, because it would enable the free importation of heavy rock or stone walls or foundations for houses, or would tend to reduce their wages and enable him to conduct a more profitable business. He did not stop to consider that possibly some of his men, laborers as they were, were broader in comprehension and character than he, and that his business would always be safer in the hands of the workman who voted as his judgment dictated and defied discharge and the consequent suffering, despite the threats of such small despots.

But, regardless of the skill, excellence, and faithfulness of the employé, whether he were single or a man of family, the advance of the season, or any such consideration, the employé's vote was to determine whether he should remain employed or go. To accomplish this threat and make the duress of poverty and necessity more forceful and successful, employer Kelley appears at the polls about 4 p. m., the time his men are to leave their work and vote. He stationed himself at a point where they would have to pass in approaching the judges, inspects the tickets in their hands, and when one of them had the hardihood and manliness to cast his own vote, and not that of the quarryman, the latter follows him and vehemently tells him he will be the first to go. Such things disgrace the precincts in which they occur, and the strong hand of public contempt and the stronger hand of the law should be laid heavily upon such men and such transactions wherever they occur. There was a time when the law recognized no duress except that which resulted from actual violence, the bludgeon, or the pistol; but we have come to recognize that a higher manhood quails sooner at beholding the hunger and suffering of wife and children than at the mere contemplation of personal pain or indignity. The threat of deprivation of honorable employment is more alarming and may be made more insidiously and covertly; there is less protection against it, and it is therefore more to be condemned than threats of violence. Men who threaten violence can be proceeded against and held to keep the peace. There is no remedy against discharge by a political "boss." This character of duress has been recognized in Congress and elsewhere.

In the legislation of Ohio, section 7065 of the Revised Statutes declares it to be a felony for an employer to threaten to withhold or reduce wages or to dismiss from his employ any laborer with the view of influencing his vote. Here, then, we have the law and the fact. What is the effect upon the vote? As to the employés thus sought to be affected it is not necessary to show how they voted. The burden of showing that the intimidation, once established, produced no results is upon the one authorizing it or to be benefited by it. It is presumed to have had its effect. If all the men voted for Hurd it could easily be shown. If all would have voted for Romeis anyhow, evidence of that fact could have been adduced. But the intimidation would naturally deter Democrats from voting their sentiments; it would close the ears and hearts of Republicans to reason and argument and deter them from change or conviction; and it is the inevitable consequence that it taints with illegality and uncertainty the vote of each one of the employés where it is not shown that he acted independently of it. There are important reasons why the burden of disproving the consequences of intimidation ought to be thrown upon the one who authorizes it or profits by it. The burden ought to rest upon him as a penalty for its use. It is much easier to establish its non-effect, where it produces no results, than to prove its affirmative consequences. It is unjust to require a contestant to resort to evidence of the employés to prove their own humiliation, which human nature is naturally unwilling to acknowledge. And this position is sustained by authorities.

Sir, we are beginning to realize that a feeling of unrest is seizing upon the great mass of the laboring men. Slowly but surely the great fact is dawning upon them, that they do not participate in a just distribution of the results and products of their own labor. An unknown artisan in Europe, standing at the head of a few brawny-armed grime-faced workmen, shouts to the crowned heads to beware and heed the cries of despair, for one of these days, when standing armies are sent to suppress the disorder of misery, even the armies will lay down their arms, or deliver them to labor; and his words echo around the world. Even here discontent and organization go hand in hand. The huge leviathan only moves and it shakes the land. The huge turmoil rests at no rivers and stops at no State lines, but fills the broad land. Resolutions of investigation and statutes for arbitration will avail nothing unless practicable and appreciable results follow.

Labor must be encouraged and protected, not upon any principle of socialism, or invasion of rights of property, but in the adequate reward and compensation for what it does and accomplishes. It must know and feel that in the enjoyment, comforts, privileges, and protection of a civilization which it practically creates, it receives a just and equitable participation, and is not cheated and defrauded, limited and starved at each turn, day and night. Here in this unimportant contested-election case labor may be not only protected and dignified, but, sir, whenever you elevate its ballot to the plane of intelligence and independence you also guard and fortify it. Congress may not have power to increase or regulate wages, but it can by guarding and protecting an independent ballot in the hands of wage-men put it in their power to accomplish those results. Power and capital may still exact. At their mills and factories and around the operations of great corporations and combinations they may grind down wages, but when they come in the presence of the urn where we cast the suffrages of freemen even these mighty forces must fall back and uncover in the presence of the humblest when he comes to exercise this right. And when it shall be made to appear that this right has been invaded, that power, success, and insolence stand at the very door and block the way to the urn, hold poverty, suffering, and deprivation above the heads of humble men as the consequences of freedom and independence, the judgment of condemnation should be as swift as are the bolts of Heaven, and as effective too. In the present case there is no remedy or redress except the rejection of at least 50 of the votes cast by these employés of Norman Kelly.

(4) I come now to the illegal votes cast at the city of Toledo. In October, 1884, for the last time, Ohio held an October election. The Presidential election occurring in November enabled a comparison between the voters as to name, number, residence, &c., at that and the October election. It soon became apparent that a large number of votes were cast by persons in October who did not vote in November; and a great many who voted in November who did not vote in October. Careful, thorough, and prompt investigation showed that most if not all these strange persons voting in October had disappeared. They had voted, and then "folded their tents, like the Arab, and as silently stolen away." Nobody knew them or of them. There were some 347 of this kind of voters in certain precincts specified in the record. When the contestant's evidence was completed a clear prima facie case was made out as to them. At once the contestee brought the whole party machinery into operation to help him. The local papers advertised the names of these unknown voters, and gave all the information descriptive of them possible; they were urged to come forward and disclose themselves. The citizens were urged to hold meetings and furnish information and aid in accounting for the unknown persons. And a most comprehensive search was made. It would be impossible to consider and state the evidence in all these cases, for nearly every case depends upon its own peculiar circumstances. But upon the whole record I think it may be fairly and justly declared that 200 of these voters are shown to have been illegal. Mr. Romeis insists that he has accounted for all but 72. But while there may be some 10 or 12 about which men might differ, I believe the evidence establishes the illegality of at least 200 votes.

The suggestion made in argument on the floor of the House that these illegal votes were cast for the contestant because there was an increase of the Republican vote of 105, while the Democratic increase was only 5, is too remote and inconsequential to be entitled to serious consideration. It is quite as likely that a large number of the fraudulent voters in October voted under other aliases in November, or that the Presidential contest brought out more voters and induced greater importation from across the borders. It is the very common case where it is not known for whom the votes were cast. But in view of the fact that no charge is made against Mr. Hurd's canvass, that serious and wholesale bribery is charged against that of Mr. Romeis; that the grossest violations of law are proved, it would be a strange conclusion to charge the whole consequences up to the credit of the innocent party.

There are sufficient of these votes to change the result if the illegal votes at Kelley's Island or Precinct B, ward 8, ought not to be counted. In such case what rule must be applied?

Mr. McCrary, in his valuable work, lays down three rules for the disposition of such votes:

1. Deduct such votes from the majority.
2. Apportion them between the candidates in proportion to their respective votes.
3. Declare the election void.

He says the rule of apportionment "is probably the safest that can be adopted in a court of justice, where there is no power to order a new election, and where great injury would result from declaring the office vacant."

Indeed an examination of authorities will show that this rule originated in courts of law in proceedings of quo warranto or other proceedings where the judgment of the court is without any discretion, proceeds wholly upon the evidence, and must go on behalf of one of the parties upon the preponderance of the testimony. But such is not the case in a legislative body. Even in matters of contested elections its proceedings are not wholly judicial. It possesses a discretion and a power of receiving and giving consideration to evidence of influences and operations effecting results in elections that can not be appreciated in courts. In concluding his consideration of his rules for guidance Mr. McCrary, speaking of the apportionment rules, says:

> In a legislative body having power to order a new election, and in any other tribunal having the same power, it will doubtless generally be safer and more conducive to the ends of justice to order such new election than to reach a result by the application of the rule above stated. (Section 299.)

Now, sir, according to my judgment, the House has this kind of a case before it. There is one precinct, B, in ward 8, which in a court of law would be absolutely rejected, making a change of 200 votes, on account of the grossest violation of law, accompanied with clear indications of a change and substitution of ballots. There is another precinct in which at least 50 votes should be rejected in consequence of intimidation. There are 200 illegal votes found in the single city of Toledo, enough to warrant the presumption of the grossest corruption and use of money. Over all these hangs some evidence of actual and wholesome bribery. It may not be in the minds of some sufficient to find a verdict unless it be the Scotch one, "not proved." In the minds of a number of the committee as well as of a number of members on the floor it does bring conviction, and they have so expressed themselves. No unbiased mind can fail to experience serious doubt whether it was a just and fair election or the result is the expression of the popular will. The purity of elections and the prompt suppression of bribery and substitution of ballots are paramount to the personal rights of either of the candidates. To relegate the controversy back to the people most interested can result in no injury, and may correct a gross outrage upon law and order. No great inconvenience can result. Such an order is not only the proper solution, but it will be hailed by men of all parties as an indication on the part of this body to uphold the integrity of the ballot, and the people will be thereby induced to guard with greater care and scrutiny the conduct of elections and to compel the observance of the laws under which they are conducted. In my judgment neither contestant nor contestee is entitled to a seat, and a new election should be ordered.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, it is agreed by the parties to this contest that the contestee's returned majority is 239.

The contestant claims that the following votes should be deducted from those counted for the contestee:

First. Illegal votes in Toledo	79
Second. The majority returned for contestee in Precinct B, ward 8, Toledo	220
Third. The majority returned for contestee in Precinct C, ward 3, Toledo	166
Fourth. Votes in Kelley's Island	60
Fifth. Illegal votes in Mendora Township, Lucas County	2
Sixth. Illegal votes in Milan Township, Erie County	5
Seventh. Illegal votes in Precinct A, ward 6, Toledo	2
Total	534

Were these deductions made the contestant's majority would be 295.

The alleged illegal votes in the fifth, sixth, and seventh items can not turn the scale in the decision of this case, and I pass them by without comment. Each of the other four may determine this contention, and concerning them I desire to make some observations for the consideration of the House.

The contestant in his argument before the committee expressed surprise that he should have been defeated at the October election, 1884, while the general Democratic ticket received a very considerable majority. This was not unnatural. Nor is it strange that he should charge the cause of his defeat to the wrongdoing of the party of his opponent and demand an investigation. No man takes kindly to self-examination or self-condemnation. No man is swift to believe that his own popularity does not keep step with that of his party. No man can contemplate with satisfaction a result humiliating to his pride, and it may be in conflict with his conscientious belief that he is deserving of better things. But this result is not so unusual or anomalous as to excite surprise in the minds of disinterested persons. It is by no means uncommon. Nearly every election is attended by a similar result. The latest reported State election, that of Rhode Island, is no exception to the rule. There the Republican candidate for attorney-general was defeated by a large majority in a poll which gave the other Republican candidates about 4,500 majority. He was a man of character and ability, but did not have the confidence of the people on one important issue. So it was in the case before us.

If we seek for the cause of Mr. Hurd's defeat in the last Congressional election, we find it not in mistakes of election officials, not in illegal votes, not in bribery, not in intimidation, but in the fact that he was not on one interesting question in harmony with a majority of the people in the tenth Congressional district of Ohio. The record before us not only tends to show but demonstrates the accuracy of this conclusion. Eminent Democrats of the city of Toledo openly and boldly opposed his election. Democratic newspapers gave him little or no support, and admitted to their columns articles hostile to his fortunes and ideas. Mr. Patrick A. McGahan, a Democrat and city clerk of Toledo, called by contestant, testifies to those facts, and other witnesses called by the contestee fully corroborate his testimony.

But the most conclusive and significant evidence on this point is furnished by an examination of the state of the ballot in those wards of the city of Toledo in which Mr. Hurd claims that illegal votes were received. Such examination demonstrates, first, that illegal votes were not cast, and second, that voters in large numbers, who supported the head of the Democratic ticket, substituted Mr. Romeis for Mr. Hurd as their candidate for Congress. The head of the ticket at the October election, 1884, in Ohio, was the secretary of state. I invite your attention to the condition of the ballots in the wards of which Mr. Hurd complains:

Toledo ward 2, October election, 1884: Hurd ran behind Democratic secretary of state 36 votes; Romeis ran in advance of Republican secretary of state 33 votes.

Ward 3: Hurd ran behind Democratic secretary of state 11 votes; Romeis ran in advance of Republican secretary of state 14 votes.

Ward 4: Hurd ran behind Democratic secretary of state 98 votes; Romeis ran in advance of Republican secretary of state 106 votes.

Ward 5: Hurd ran behind Democratic secretary of state 113 votes; Romeis ran in advance of Republican secretary of state 122 votes.

Ward 7: Hurd ran behind Democratic secretary of state 80 votes; Romeis ran in advance of Republican secretary of state 40 votes.

Ward 8: Hurd ran behind Democratic secretary of state 80 votes; Romeis ran in advance of Republican secretary of state 74 votes.

Precinct B, ward 8: Hurd ran behind Democratic secretary of state 55 votes; Romeis ran in advance of Republican secretary of state 55 votes.

Entire district: Hurd ran behind Democratic secretary of state 1,509 votes; Romeis ran in advance of Republican secretary of state 1,436 votes.

What is the natural conclusion to be deduced from these returns? I will not affirm that it is impossible to account for them on one theory only. When I look into the record in this case and observe the paucity of facts therein contained and then listen to the huge and glittering argument constructed thereon, I am prepared to believe that all things are possible. I admit and admire the boundless possibilities of the ratiocination of the contestant, and no longer presume that others can not soar through the limitless realms of the air because I can not follow them in their flight.

But leaving the possibilities, and applying to these returns that ordinary common sense which serves us so well in the business of life, I respectfully submit that the probable, the natural, the reasonable inference to be drawn from this state of facts is that while a few of the Democrats who declined to vote for Mr. Hurd also failed to vote any Congressional ticket a sufficient number of them voted for Mr. Romeis to give him 239 plurality; to my mind it is the irresistible conclusion. No man has yet claimed in this case that a single illegal vote was cast for the Democratic secretary of state. Such a claim, if made, would be beyond the power of rational belief. The two great parties of the country struggled, I may say agonized, in the great October campaign in Ohio of 1884 because it was supposed that the result would in no small measure influence the Presidential election in the following November. But it was the result of the State and not the Congressional election that was to wield this influence. Therefore, no act would have been done by the Republican leaders to add one vote to the poll of the head of the Democratic ticket. If not, then 1,509 legal voters in that district voted for him who did not vote for Mr. Hurd. This number was more than sufficient to elect Mr. Romeis. Did they vote for him? Every fact in this record indicates that they did. This is the only natural explanation of the result of the election. Any other is constrained and illogical.

The same cause which leads a voter to discard his party candidate equally leads him to vote for the opposing candidate. No claim has been made that a single illegal vote was cast for the Republican secretary of state. The claim of illegality is confined to the 1,436 votes which Romeis received above the general Republican ticket. It seems to me unreasonable, I had almost said absurd, to say that those votes were not cast by the voters who voted for the Democratic secretary of state, but did not vote for Mr. Hurd.

I might well stop here and be content. But other considerations equally forcible govern my vote in this cause.

I invite the attention of the House to the character of the evidence which, it is claimed by the contestant, tends to prove illegal voting in the city of Toledo. To fully comprehend the weakness of this testimony it is necessary to refer to section 2945 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, which is as follows, namely:

SEC. 2945. No person shall be permitted to vote at any election unless he shall have been a resident of the State for one year, resident of the county for thirty days, and a resident of the township, village, or ward of a city or village for twenty days next preceding the election at which he offers to vote, except where he is the head of a family and has resided in the State, and in the county in which such township, village, or ward of a city or village is situate, the length of time required to entitle a person to vote under the provisions of this title, and shall, bona fide, remove with his family from one ward to any other in such city or village, or from a ward of such city or village to a township or village, to a ward of a city or village in same county, or from one township to another in the same county, in which cases such person shall have the right to vote in such township, village, or ward of a city or village without having resided therein the length of time above described to entitle a person to vote: Provided, That such voter so removing with his family from a township to a village, or ward of city or village, in the same county, shall not have the right to vote at any municipal election held in such city or village unless he shall have resided therein twenty days prior to such municipal election.

By this law voters who are married men may remove from one ward or precinct of a city to any other ward or precinct in said city and vote without limit as to time, and voters unmarried may vote if they have been in the precinct for twenty days previous to the day of election. The contestant originally claimed 710 illegal votes. He claims to have offered testimony concerning 365 only. How did he arrive at this latest result? He compared a single poll-book of the October election with a single poll-book of the succeeding November election, and names which he finds on the October poll-list and not on the November poll-list, or spelled differently on the two lists, he sets down as illegal votes. He then calls witnesses who testify that they are residents of the precincts, that they do not know these voters, and think they are not voters or residents of the ward. These witnesses did not go personally from house to house, nor from their knowledge of the people of the precincts or from their investigations could they testify with any certainty about these voters.

If any gentleman doubts the fairness or the accuracy of this summary of the contestant's evidence on this part of his case I ask him to examine the testimony for himself. But as it conflicts with the statements of the report of the minority, which in this part of it is a verbatim copy of the contestant's brief, I desire in proof of my summary of this evidence to say what I think will not be denied, that this evidence applied with equal force to three hundred and sixty-five, or as I make it, three hundred and sixty-six voters, and that the contestant admits that the contestee proved to his satisfaction that one hundred and fifty-three of them were legal voters. I am sure that this admitted fact amply sustains our able and experienced chairman of the Committee on Elections in his statement that "in a busy and crowded city" such evidence "can not be safe however great the opportunities of the witnesses." I say in all sincerity that I have a profound respect for the gentlemen who compose the minority of this committee, and I commend their prudence in copying into their report from Mr. Hurd's brief the statement, verbatim, "This testimony is entirely competent and always makes out a prima facie case against the voters claimed to be illegal. This doctrine is well settled." But I know that in the goodness of their hearts they will forgive me if I follow Mr. Turner rather than Mr. Hurd.

The minority of the committee, again copying the brief of Mr. Hurd verbatim in their report, says:

The contestee recognized the force of the rule of law and accepted the onus of the proof, and undertook to show that the persons whose names were presented by the contestant were not illegal voters but possessed the qualifications necessary to make them electors at the various precincts where they voted.

I do not so understand the fact to be. I understand that the contestee denies that this evidence is sufficient to throw the burden on him; but there being no tribunal to decide this question, he did show by competent evidence that all the voters claimed to be illegal voters were legal voters by investigations made from three to five months after the election, except seventy-nine. And I maintain and submit to this House that this fact that in the great city of Toledo, with its constantly shifting population, with its manifold industries, with its young men constantly coming and going, Mr. Romeis has been able to locate all voters who have been claimed to be doubtful except seventy-nine in a poll of 16,188; or, if we restrict it to the precincts contested, 9,008, is a result which no man would have ventured to foretell. In how many of the districts of the gentlemen on this floor could it probably be done? As showing still further how unreliable the contestant's evidence is, and how thoroughly his claim is disproved, I insert a table abstracted by me from the record, showing the illegal votes claimed, the illegal votes claimed to be testified to, those proved to be legal, and those concerning which no testimony has been offered, in each precinct of the city of Toledo:

Ward and Precinct.	Number of votes claimed by Hurd.	Number of votes testified to by Hurd's witnesses.	Number of votes proved by Romeis to be legal.	Balance.
Ward 1, precinct A	20
Ward 1, precinct B	20
Ward 1, precinct C	10
Ward 2, precinct A	20	30	21	9
Ward 2, precinct B	40	43	29	14
Ward 2, precinct C	15	9	9
Ward 3, precinct A	35	41	33	8
Ward 3, precinct B	45	21	17	4
Ward 3, precinct C	20	8	8
Ward 4, precinct A	60	35	26	9
Ward 4, precinct B	20	18	17	1
Ward 4, precinct C	20	8	5	3
Ward 5, precinct A	25	25	13	12
Ward 5, precinct B	50	18	13	5
Ward 5, precinct C	75	18	15	3
Ward 6, precinct A	45
Ward 6, precinct B	25
Ward 7, precinct A	30	7	6	1
Ward 7, precinct B	30	16	16
Ward 7, precinct C	15
Ward 8, precinct A	25	21	25	4
Ward 8, precinct B	25
Ward 8, precinct C	40	40	34	6
	710	366	287	79

Again, the case of the contestant is fatally defective in that he furnishes no evidence to prove for whom these votes were cast. This is admitted by the report of the minority. In the absence of such proof these votes can not be deducted from either candidate. This doctrine is well settled by this House in recent cases of Wigginton vs. Pacheco, Forty-sixth Congress; Massey vs. Wise, Forty-eighth Congress; O'Ferrall vs. Paul, Forty-eighth Congress; Garrison vs. Mayo, Forty-eighth Congress.

Every principle of justice and right requires that this rule should be adhered to firmly and strictly. The propriety and indeed necessity of this doctrine is established and emphasized by facts proved in this case. In ward 2, Precinct A, the contestant claims to have made out a prima facie case against 30 votes of which the contestee proved 21 to be legal. He also proved that 13 of these votes were Democratic. Now, according to the rule contended for by the contestant, he would have received the benefit of 13 votes and the contestee would have had 13 votes, which were never cast for him, deducted from his majority. Could anything be more unjust or iniquitous than this?

So much for the claim of illegal votes in Toledo. The contestant has utterly failed in law and in fact to establish his claim. The quotation from McCrary on Elections, which the contestant parades with so much ostentation, and which the minority of the committee copy, even to the varying type in which it is printed, is a boomerang full of danger to him. The learned author says: "If the district or territory within which the voter must reside is large or very populous and the witness has not an intimate and extensive acquaintance with the inhabitants the evidence will be of little value, and standing alone will avail nothing." The contestant admits that his witnesses were mistaken one hundred and thirty-five times out of three hundred and forty-seven, and it is the fact that they were mistaken two hundred and eighty-seven times out of three hundred and sixty-six. Such evidence is indeed "of little value, and standing alone will avail nothing."

I now come to consider the claim of the contestant that 220 votes for contestee in Precinct B of ward 8 should be thrown out. The argument already made applies to this claim, and I desire to emphasize but not repeat it. I pass on to refer to that part of the contestant's claim which is peculiar to this precinct.

He charges bribery and attempts to prove it by two witnesses, S. Gerstmann and Louis Jahn. The gravity of this charge, and, in this instance, its high improbability, demands ample proof to convince us of its truth. This precinct was composed almost entirely of German and Poles, voters who would be most likely to vote for Mr. Romeis. Frederick Warnke, an unimpeached and uncontradicted witness, says that Mr. Romeis had always had "a big majority in this precinct. * * * The voters were for Mr. Romeis from the start."

Let us look at the witnesses and the testimony on which the contestant relies.

S. Gerstmann says that he went to Toledo under supervision of the national Republican committee in the beginning of September; can't tell what precincts he visited, or what wards until asked directly by Mr. Hurd if it was ward eighth, then says he presumes it was (page 116 of the record); that the sentiment was for Hurd; "it could be changed by dealing out a good many kegs of lager beer;" "that would cost money;" "to approximate it, they said that two or three thousand dollars would change the whole thing, but if they had any for that purpose I don't know." Witness says that he reported at State and national Republican headquarters. What was said at State headquarters he is not asked by Mr. Hurd, and does not state. The only things said at national headquarters which witness reports is that Mr. Elkins said to him: "You go ahead and tell the chairman of the State committee to do all they can" (page 116); that witness went to Toledo "about five or six days," about the Wednesday before election, to wit, October 8, and found, as he says, the sentiment changed from Hurd to Romeis.

There is no proof of bribery. But who is the witness? His cross-examination shows as follows: He says "I have lived in Cincinnati since August, 1885; just prior to that lived in Savannah, Ga., thirteen years." (Record, page 117.) Was in United States Army from 1854 to 1859. (Record, page 118.) Lived in Savannah, Ga., at breaking out of the war and became a Jewish rabbi to avoid conscription in confederate army. Lived in Americus, Ga., from August, 1859, till February, 1860. Lived in Savannah, Ga., from February, 1860, till 1870. Declines to answer how long he lived in Savannah after 1870. Declines to answer where he lived after he left Savannah. (Record, page 119.) Did not belong to any political party "other than my own."

Q. What is that?
A. Myself; self-preservation is the first law of nature. (Record, page 119.)
Q. How many times have you been in prison since 1879?
A. I don't think I was any time in prison.
Q. Are you positive of that?
A. I am not positive of that.
Q. You would have known whether you were or not?
A. I suppose I would. (Record, page 120.)

Lived in Danville, Pa., seven months. Lived in Portsmouth, Ohio, in 1872 and 1873. Lived in Sacramento, Cal., in 1880. Lived in Helena, Ark., in 1881. (Record, page 120.) Had no business.

I was a candidate for Government office if General Hancock had been elected and I was a candidate under Garfield. (Record, page 121.)

The witness reiterates on cross-examination what he said on direct examination, that he was in Toledo twice, to wit, once early in September, and the second time five or six days before the election of October 14, after he had been in New York, and that it was this second time that he discovered the change of sentiment from Hurd to Romeis until he is confronted with these facts, drawn out of his own mouth by the hardest kind of cross-examination, to wit:

First. That on this visit to New York he went to the Democratic headquarters, saw and talked with Mr. Smalley, the secretary of the national Democratic committee. (Page 121.)

Second. That he shortly after received a letter from Mr. Smalley at Cincinnati, addressed to the chairman of the committee of the Democratic party in Ohio, with certain authority in it, which he first says he destroyed and then partially admits that he sent to the chairman or showed to the secretary of that committee. (Page 122.)

Third. That for some purpose he moved into the back part of the room with said secretary, but does not remember the conversation with him there. (Pages 122 and 123.)

Fourth. That on his arrival in Toledo, five or six days before election, he went directly to the house of Mr. Hyde or Hyne, a Democratic friend, and staid there until he went to see the secretary of the Democratic committee, and then returned to Mr. Hyde's house and remained there until he left Toledo. (Vide 123.)

After all this was shown the witness said he was in Toledo three times, and it was on this third visit, which was the second in order of time, that he discovered the change in sentiment. He now says this visit covered two days (pages 125 and 127), but in his direct examination only one. (Page 117.)

He will not say that the time between the first and second visit was more than one week, until he sees how absurd it is to say the sentiment changed in so short a time. (Page 126.)

This witness finally recontradicts himself by swearing that the interview with Mr. Elkins and the interview with Mr. Smalley were on the same day. (Page 128.)

In this man's interviews with the member of the Democratic State and city committee he carefully inquired into their financial condition. (Page 124.)

In his conversation with Mr. Jackson, the secretary of the Democratic county committee, this witness never mentioned to him that the Republicans were buying up this precinct or any other. (Pages 126 127.)

The only satisfaction to be got out of this witness's testimony is when he swears at the close of the cross-examination that he did not get any money out of either the Democratic or Republican committee. (Page 128.)

Although carefully questioned, this witness tells the name of only one person who told him what the sentiment of the precinct was, and says that person was Ferdinand Warnke, and that he had three conversations with Warnke.

Ferdinand Warnke is called by the contestee as a witness, and testifies that Gerstmann did have a conversation with him, in which he desired him to go and see one Sam Stettiner, the chairman of the Democratic county committee. Warnke contradicts Gerstmann in every particular. Mr. Warnke appears to be a fair and honest witness. His testimony is brief, and I insert it in full in my remarks as it appears in the record of the case:

MONDAY, April 13, 1885—2 p. m.

Mr. Romeis being present by his counsel, and Mr. Hurd in person, the taking of depositions in the above-entitled action was resumed, as follows:

Ferdinand Warnke, of lawful age, being first duly sworn to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as hereinafter certified, deposes and says:

808. State your name, age, and place of residence.
A. Ferdinand Warnke; 50 years; reside at the corner of Tecumseh and Elizabeth streets, in Toledo, Ohio.
809. In what precinct and ward did you reside during summer and fall of 1884?
A. In Precinct B of the eighth, Toledo, Ohio.
810. Of what nationality are the residents of that precinct generally?
A. Some Polanders, some Germans, and some Irish.
811. What business are you engaged in, and in what precinct and ward is that business located?
A. Groceries and provisions; in Precinct B of the eighth ward.
812. State whether during the month of September or the first two weeks in October, 1884, you at any time or at any place had an interview with a man by the name of Gerstmann, from Cincinnati, Ohio, and, if so, when and where that interview was.
A. I did; it was on a Sunday afternoon, between 3 and 4 o'clock, at my place of business; don't know just what date; it was some time before the election.
813. Have you ever seen him more than once?
A. No.
814. At the time you did see him did you state to him in words or in substance that the voters in your ward or precinct were all for Mr. Hurd?
A. No.
815. Did you state to him in words or in substance that beer, cigars, or money could induce them, or any of them, to vote for Mr. Romeis?
A. No.
816. Did you state to him that any sum of money whatever could induce them to vote for Romeis?
A. No.
(The last three questions and answers objected to by Mr. Hurd.)
817. Was the subject of money in connection with the election of Mr. Romeis mentioned between you?
A. No.
818. Was anybody present at the conversation you had with him?
A. No; we sat by a table in my saloon; just he and I.

819. Please now state what he said and all that took place between you.
A. When he came in at my place he said, "Is this Warnke's place?" I said "Yes." He then said, "What do you think about the election?" and I said, "I don't know." He says, "Are you acquainted with Stettiner and Landman? They sent me down to you, and that I should ask you how the election would be." And then told me I should go down to Sam Stettiner's the next Monday morning. I said, "I don't know if I will come or not." Then he says, "I haven't much time; I would like to go out to see the Pollocks in our precinct, down to groceryman's by the name of Bolter, Rudolph Bolter." Then he said, Give me a pony beer." He then went out and I staid in my saloon.
820. Was anything said by him as to how the vote would stand in that precinct between Mr. Hurd and Mr. Romeis; and if so, what?
A. He asked that. I told him "I guessed they were all for Romeis. Romeis is a good man; that we don't want free trade." He then said, "Don't forget to come down to Stettiner's at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. I'll be there, too." That's all he said, and then went out.
821. Was the Sam Stettiner of whom you speak chairman of the Democratic county committee?
A. I guess he was.
822. Did you go down to Stettiner's the next day?
A. No.
823. Do you know who the majority of the voters in your precinct were in favor of when Messrs. Hurd and Romeis were first nominated for Congress?
A. For Romeis.
824. Did they continue to be in favor of Romeis until the election?
A. Yes; they kept it up until the election.
825. Has Mr. Romeis many friends among the Germans and Poles of that precinct?
A. Yes, sir; he has.
826. Have they voted for him often in that precinct?
A. Yes, sir; with a big majority.
827. When he has been a candidate, who has received a majority in that precinct, he or the man that opposed him?
A. I guess he (Mr. Romeis) has received a majority. This was the case when he was a candidate for mayor three times, and when he ran for Congress.

Cross-examination by Mr. Hurd:

828. Can you state more definitely how long before the election it was that you had this conversation with Mr. Gerstmann?
A. I don't know. It was a week or two weeks before; can't tell exactly.
829. How long did your conversation with him last?
A. May be ten minutes; may be not so long.
830. How many persons were present in the saloon while you were talking with him?
A. There were ten or twelve. They were in one part of the saloon and we were in another. Nobody heard what we spoke.
831. Did he tell you his name and where he came from?
A. No; he told me he came from Cincinnati.
832. Was anything said about the Presidential election, or about Cleveland and Blaine?
A. Yes; he said from this election we'll find out how the next will be.
833. Do you know how long he remained in that precinct that afternoon?
A. No, I do not.

Mr. Hurd here reserves the right to recall Mr. Warnke for further cross-examination.

FERDINAND WARNKE.

APRIL 21, 1885—2 p. m.

Both parties were present by counsel.
Thereupon Mr. Ferdinand Warnke was recalled, under agreement heretofore noted, and testified under cross-examination as follows:
1250. You are the same Ferdinand Warnke who has heretofore testified in this case, are you?
A. I am.
1251. In what precinct and ward is your business located?
A. In Precinct B of the eighth ward.
1252. Where is your place of business situated with reference to the voting place in that precinct?
A. It is on the opposite corner of the same block.
1253. Where do the people live, and to what class do they belong, who patronize or trade with you at your place of busfness?
A. Pollocks, Germans, and some Irish, living all around in said Precinct B of the eighth ward.
1254. Was any money spent by any one who was working in the interest of Mr. Romeis in the Congressional campaign in the fall of 1884 in treating the voters of your precinct or ward at your place of business in said Precinct B?
A. No.
Did Mr. Romeis, the contestee in this case, spend any money in said Congressional campaign in buying lager beer or other drinks at your place of business for the voters of your ward or precinct?
A. No.
1255. Did said contestee give you any money, or did any one for him give you any money, to pay for beer or other drinks to be furnished by you to the voters of your ward or precinct?
A. No.
1256. Did you have any money furnished you by any one during that campaign to pay for beer or other drinks to be furnished by you to the voters of your ward or precinct?
A. No.
1257. Was any money given you during said campaign to pay for groceries, provisions, or any such things to be by you furnished to the voters of your ward or precinct?
A. No.
1258. Was any money given you by Mr. Romeis, or by any one in his behalf, to pay for services rendered by you for Mr. Romeis during said Congressional campaign?
A. No.
1259. Was any money given to you by any one to pay for services rendered by any one during said Congressional campaign?
A. No.
1260. Was any money paid to you, or to any one for you, or to you for any one else, or did you have any agreement with any one to receive yourself, or that any one should receive money for you, or that you should receive money for any one else, or that you should pay money to any one to induce them or you to vote and work and to vote or work in the interest of said contestee during said Congressional campaign or on the day of election, October 14, 1884?
A. No.
1261. Did you pay any money yourself for services rendered at the polls in precinct B of the eighth ward on the 14th day of October, 1884?
A. No.
1262. You say in your examination-in-chief that Mr. Gerstmann asked you to meet him the next day at the store of Stettiner & Landreau, do you not?
A. Yes.
1263. Did you go there the next day to meet him?
A. I did not.
1264. Why did you not go?
A. I told him there was no need for me to go there; there was time enough before election.
1265. What did you mean by the expression that "there was time enough before election?"
A. I meant that I wouldn't go there Monday, the next day.
1266. Did you aid any one in getting their naturalization papers in the fall of 1884?
A. No.
1267. Did you furnish to any one money to pay for naturalization papers during the fall of 1884?
A. No.
1268. Did you pay money, or agree to pay money, to any one for the time they spent for obtaining their naturalization papers?
A. No.
1269. Do you know of any one in your ward or precinct who obtained his naturalization papers at any time during the fall of 1884?
A. No.
1270. Were you in any way connected with or consulted with about obtaining the naturalization papers of any one at any time during the fall of 1884?
A. I was not.

FERDINAND WARNKE.

Now, is it possible, that any man, in the face of this testimony, can believe, as the report of the minority asserts, that this Gerstmann's "testimony remains uncontradicted and unimpeached?" Moreover, this testimony is not competent, because it is hearsay. Hearsay evidence has been repeatedly held inadmissible in election cases, as in Duffy vs. Mason, Digest, 1876 to 1880, page 368.

Greenleaf on Evidence, in asserting that hearsay evidence is uniformly incompetent, says:

> Its intrinsic weakness, its incompetency to satisfy the mind as to the existence of the fact, and the frauds which may be practiced under its cover, all combine to support the rule that hearsay evidence is wholly inadmissible.

Yes, "the frauds which may be practiced under its cover." That leads me to inquire why this Gerstmann was selected as the only witness to prove these facts. He testifies, referring to himself, "self-preservation is the first law of nature." He tried to sell himself to both political parties and failed. Mr. Hurd well knew the character of this man after his cross-examination was completed, and yet called no witness to corroborate him. In this precinct 103 witnesses had voted for Mr. Hurd. Was there not one of this 103 who would sustain Gerstmann? The fair inference is that there was not.

If it be attempted to support this witness by Louis Jahn it will be found that the same observations may apply to him, though not for the same reasons. This man, it is true, was a Republican judge at this precinct, but he was a Republican only in name. It is evident that through some fancied or real grievance he did all he could to defeat Mr. Romeis and to elect Mr. Hurd. He testifies that he voted the split ticket, and when asked, "Whom did you vote for for secretary of state?" Mr. Hurd makes haste to tell him that he need not tell for whom he voted unless he pleases to. (Record, page 69.)

What is his testimony on this point? He says, and his expression is important:

> Much as I know nineteen ticket peddlers around there, * * * and Henry Gates paid them off the same night in Joe Boldt's grocery. * * * Much as I know some got $3, some $5, and a few $10.

On cross-examination he says that he knew nothing about it except what was told him by Gates and others. This is hearsay testimony beyond all question.

But were it evidence it does not prove either the number of ticket-peddlers or the amounts paid. Whatever was done was done openly. It was a perfectly legitimate transaction and is done everywhere. I have known it to be done for years, and I never heard it questioned. These ticket peddlers were paid for services and according to the value of their respective services. There is not a word of evidence tending to show that they were not Republicans.

The contestant claims that the election in this precinct is void for uncertainty in the count of the ballots. This I can not agree to. No precinct shall be disfranchised by my consent unless in a case of absolute necessity. No necessity for any such course of action exists in this case.

The election was honestly conducted, and the officers tried to do their duty. So testifies Louis Jahn at page 75 of the record. I have examined the poll-books and the tally-sheets and they bear the marks of honesty and accuracy. The poll-books of the two clerks agree and show 430 votes. A careful counting and tallying of the votes showed 426 votes. And of these votes, 323 were for Romeis and 103 for Hurd, giving Romeis a majority of 220 votes. Mr. James Kelley, the Democratic judge, says that the only uncertainty about the vote, as ascertained and counted and returned, grows out of the fact that the tally-sheet of the clerks showed 2 less votes than appeared on the poll-book. (Vide page 30 of the record.)

Now, the utmost that could by any possibility be claimed for Mr. Hurd is 12 votes. There is no evidence whatever of tampering with or corrupting the ballot, or destruction of ballots. If such allegations are founded on the testimony I am unable to discover it. To charge these judges and clerks with fraud and crime for what was at the utmost a mistake in counting seems to me to be utterly unfair and unjust. These men strove to do their duty. Why, I ask, should they be branded as knaves and criminals? I emphasize again the testimony of Mr. Jahn: "The officers tried to do their duty." Mr. Jahn was strongly prejudiced in favor of Hurd, and yet he is obliged to testify, "The election was honestly conducted, and the officers tried to do their duty." Will honorable gentlemen on this floor declare that this man and his Democratic associate and the other judge and the clerks were guilty of such base and wicked crimes? I can not believe it.

It clearly appears to me that the first counts, which showed a difference of from 4 to 7 votes above the poll-list, and as to the number the witnesses differ, was probably incorrect; yet to give Mr. Hurd the benefit of every doubt, count 12 votes in his favor and reduce Romeis's majority in this precinct to 208 votes. It is all that he can fairly claim, and more than the testimony would fairly give him.

The contestant has sought out and made every legal objection to this precinct that possibly could be found, however small. While such a course of procedure does not commend itself to my mind, and while a seat in this House obtained on such grounds would not in my estimation be worth the having, I admit that it is his right to require the committee to consider these points of law, and without prejudice to give him the full benefit of them.

His first objection is that one of the judges did not reside in the precinct. The answer to that is, that he resided in the ward, which is all that the statute requites. (Vide Ohio Revised Statutes, section 2923.)

His second objection is that both clerks were Republicans, while the law requires that they should be of opposite political parties.

The decisions of this House and of the courts of the country show that this does not affect the validity of the election. I cited Baird vs. Bank (11 Sergeant and Rawle, 414, supreme court of Pennsylvania):

A person indisputably ineligible may be an officer de facto by color of election.

Pritchett et al. vs. The People (1 Gilman, 529, supreme court of Illinois):

It is a general principle of the law that ministerial acts of an officer de facto are valid and effectual when they concern the public and the rights of third parties, although it may appear that he has no legal or constitutional right to the office.

To the same effect are: McGregor vs. Balch, 14 Vermont, 428; People vs. Cook, 14 Barbour, 259 (N. Y.); Taylor vs. Taylor et al., 10 Minnesota, 107; Saint Louis County Court vs. Sparks, 10 Missouri, 121; Whepley vs. McKune, 10 California, 352; and in this House, Barnes vs. Adams, 2 Bartlett, 760; Eggleston vs. Strader, 2 Bartlett, 897.

That officers conducting an election, canvassing boards and return judges, are ministerial officers is settled by the decisions in nearly every State.

In concluding my review of the numerous objections to the vote in this precinct, I have this much to say, that not one dollar is shown to have been used improperly in it; there is no evidence that anybody was bribed; not even so much as a glass of beer was given to any voter to influence his vote; that the vote was cast in favor of the man who had always carried the precinct by large majorities; that the ballots from the time they were cast until they were counted were in the custody of the duly elected officers of the precinct and of no other person whatever; that they were honestly counted, and that the result, so far as it affects this contest, is certain beyond a doubt; and that no valid legal objection has been shown why it should not be counted in favor of Mr. Romeis substantially as it was returned by the officers of that election.

I come now to consider the contestant's objections to the vote in Precinct C, ward 3, Toledo.

This precinct gave Romeis 166 majority.

The contestant claims that this majority should be discounted from Romeis's vote and this precinct disfranchised. For what reason? That one Robert H. Bell interfered with the ballots.

The report of the chairman of the committee truly states that this complaint is supported by the evidence of one of the clerks of the election, but is negatived by the judges and flatly denied by Bell.

One David Emerick, one of the clerks of the election, is the only witness who saw what the contestant here complains of. He testifies: "Mr. Bell stood at the head of the table, with his arm on the ballot-box, and as the tickets would exhaust he would put his hand in the ballot-box and put them on the table as the judges would sort them out." (Vide page 12 of the record.) And on cross-examination he testifies:

All he done was, he took them out of the ballot-box and threw them on the table, that I see.

This is the whole of his offending. It was done in the presence of the three judges and two clerks representing the two political parties.

Now, contestee claims that this occurred in November and not in October. But suppose it occurred in October, and suppose the rule of law is as stated in contestant's brief and copied with his argument thereon bodily and verbatim into the report of the minority of the committee; then on his own showing and on his own rule of law he has failed to make a case.

Mr. Hurd, at page 32 of his brief (page 20 of the report), states the rule of law governing the case, in the following words:

Any interference with them—

Meaning the ballots—

by an unauthorized person, any handling or taking them into possession by others than the proper officers, whereby an opportunity to tamper with them and alter them has been given, will be fatal to the count, unless the clearest and most satisfactory information has been made of the conduct of such person. The burden is shifted to the contestee to show that what was done did not interfere with the ascertainment of the true result.

Mr. Romeis has complied with this rule of law, and his compliance is found in the testimony of Mr. E. D. Potter, the Democratic judge of election in this precinct at the October and November elections, 1884. His cross-examination on pages 140 and 141 of the record was as follows, namely:

1. Q. You were the Democratic judge at the October election, 1884, at that precinct, were you not?
A. Yes, sir.
2. Q. How long have you known Robert H. Bell?
A. About forty years.
3. Q. He has been your immediate neighbor for a number of years, has he not?
A. Yes, sir.
4. Q. For how many years?
A. Oh, I have lived as near neighbor ever since he has lived here, for about forty years.
5. Q. It is true, is it not, that up until the October election, 1884, you and he had been upon the election board of that precinct at every election held therein from the time of the formation of the precinct?
A. We have ever since the appointments of judges of election were made by the city council.
6. Q. Whether the appointing power has been either Democratic or Republican you two have always been selected as two of the judges of that precinct, have you not?
A. Yes, sir.
7. Q. I will now ask you what his general reputation is in that precinct and in this city for honesty and integrity?
(Question objected to as irrelevant and incompetent.)
A. It has always been good.
(Answer objected to as irrelevant and incompetent.)
8. Q. In all your association with him in the conduct of elections in that precinct I will ask you if you have ever known him to do an unfair or dishonorable act?
(Question objected to as irrelevant and incompetent.)
A. I never have.
9. Q. I will now ask you if all the votes cast at Precinct C, third ward, on October 14, 1884, were taken from the ballot-box and counted?
A. Every one, and they corresponded with the tally-sheet.
10. Q. Were any ballots counted at that time which were not deposited in the ballot-box by the voters of the precinct?
A. I don't think there was; I saw every ballot taken from the box.
11. Q. At the time Robert H. Bell did take tickets from the box, as stated by you, did you see him while so doing?
A. Yes, sir.
12. Did he at that time place any tickets in the box?
A. I didn't see him put any in; I didn't see him if he did; I should have known it if he had.
13. Q. From what you know of him and his personal character as a man would you suspect him of doing so?
(Objected to as irrelevant and incompetent.)
A. I wouldn't believe it of him.
14. Q. Did he at that time place any tickets on the table which he did not get from the ballot-box?
A. I should think he did not; I should have been likely to have seen him if he had.
15. Q. From your knowledge of his personal character would you suspect him of doing so?
(Objected to as irrelevant and incompetent.)
A. I should not suspect him of it.
16. Q. Is it not true that between the spring election of 1884 and the October election 1884 he removed out of that precinct, and is not that the reason why he was not appointed judge with you for the October election?
(Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant and not proper cross-examination.)
A. He was appointed judge in June with me, and before the October election moved out of the precinct. Bob was a little officious and thought the new hands were not quite rapid enough and wanted to give them instructions, I suppose.
17. Q. I will now ask you if the canvass and declaration of the vote of Precinct C of the third ward of Toledo, on October 14, 1884, was not in all respects in accordance with the ballots deposited by the voters of that precinct on that day?
(Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and not proper cross-examination.)
A. Well, I think they were.
18. Q. Do you know of any act of deceit or fraud at that precinct on that day, either in the receiving of the ballots, their count, or the declaration thereof?
(Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and not proper cross-examination.)
A. I don't know of any deceit or fraud practiced at that election; I don't believe there was any.
19. Q. Do you know of any voter voting at that precinct who was not by law entitled to vote there; and, if so, who was he?
(Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and not proper cross-examination.)
A. There was one man who voted there who was not entitled to vote in that precinct, and only one. The third ward and the seventh ward are separated by Franklin avenue, and he lived on the seventh ward side, and about a half-hour after he came back and said that he had found that he had voted at the wrong precinct and wanted his vote back. I told him if he didn't vote at the other precinct there would be no harm done. I do not remember his name.
(Answer objected to as incompetent and irrelevant.)
20. Q. For whom did he vote for Representative in Congress?
(Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and not proper cross-examination.)
A. He voted the straight Democratic ticket, I think. My reason for thinking so was that he was brought there by one of our Democratic brethren. I did not see his ticket.

EMERY D. POTTER.

George W. Waterman, another judge of elections in this precinct, testified on page 221 of the record, as follows, namely:

878. Please state fully the process adopted from the time the ballot-box was unlocked until the count was completed.

A. We first counted the ballots without opening them. I took the ballots from the box and laid them on the table in a pile. All the judges and clerks proceeded to count from the pile to see if the number of ballots corresponded with the number of names on the poll-book. I think they corresponded exactly. We then proceeded to unroll them and assort them out. We laid them in separate piles, putting the unscratched Democratic tickets in one pile, the scratched Democratic tickets in another pile; then did the same with the Republican tickets—likewise with the Prohibition tickets. Then the tickets were called off, Mr. Kirk and Judge Potter, the other judge, taking turns in the reading. The tickets were then recorded by the clerks, and I strung them on the string. The tickets were then placed back in the box and the poll-books were then completed and signed.

879. State whether all of the tickets in the box at the time it was first unlocked were counted?

A. Yes, sir; they were.

880. Were any tickets counted that were not in the box at the time it was first unlocked?

A. No, sir.

Here it is clearly shown that the acts of Mr. Bell, admitting that they took place at the October election, "did not interfere with the ascertainment of the true result." It was not fraudulent. Mr. Hurd never claimed any such thing nor did he charge it in his notice of contest. I do not understand the law to be as laid down by Mr. Hurd, nor does the case of Cary vs. Twombly, in New York, which he cites sustain him. The facts in that case so widely differ from those of this case that it is not in point. Even if Bell had violated the penal statutes of Ohio, and was liable to punishment, it by no means follows that the people of a whole precinct are to suffer. The people of the country have some rights which we are bound to respect. In this precinct 472 citizens deposited their ballots for Congressional candidates. All except 1, which was cast for Mr. Hurd, were legal votes. They were counted and corresponded with the poll-book. It is clear that the true result was declared. To disfranchise these honest citizens upon any such irregularity as the one here alleged will be a gross and unpardonable wrong to them, against which I most earnestly protest.

The last claim of contestant, to which I wish to refer, is that of Kelley's Island. The report of the minority say that 29 votes should be rejected on the ground of intimidation practiced by Norman Kelley. The claim is of little importance in the decision of this case, and my reference to it will be brief. Mr. Kelley worked a stone-quarry on Kelley's Island and employed about seventy men. The only conversation proved between Mr. Kelley and his men is thus stated in contestant's brief: 'He said to them that if Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Hurd should be elected, and Mr. Hurd's free-trade views should prevail, he would not want more than one-third of the men he was then employing, and that when he would be compelled to discharge men the first to go would be those who voted for Mr. Hurd and against his interest." This summary of the evidence is much stronger than the record will justify, but I pass it.

It is said that Mr. Kelley stood at the polls and asked to see the tickets of his men. "Some showed them and some did not." (Minority report, page 14.)

Was this intimidation? I asked Mr. Hurd at the first day's hearing before the committee to show me a case where it was held to be intimidation, and he has not yet done so. As I understand the law, it is necessary in order to throw out a precinct on the ground of intimidation to prove such acts as would intimidate men of ordinary firmness. If an employé is intimidated by being told by his employer that if he votes for a certain candidate and such vote ruin the employer's business he will be discharged, he must be a very weak man. The laboring man in our country is not to be turned from his course by any such talk. It is an insult to him to assert it. I rejoice that in our land of freedom the poor man, the laboring man, the mechanic, every worker with his hand, in the quarry, in the factory, in the fields, on the railroads, everywhere and at all times, can and does look every other man, however wealthy or powerful, squarely in the face, and proclaims by his voice, his pen, and his vote his principles, his needs, his hopes.

Again, the contestant has failed to show that any man was intimidated. The law governing this subject is well settled.

Where it is alleged that a large number of persons have been deterred from voting by violence or intimidation, the testimony of those persons, or some of them, should be produced. The opinions and impressions of others is not sufficient. (Norris vs. Handley, Forty-second Congress.)

As a matter of fact, in the case under consideration no voter was intimidated, nor has any employé of Mr. Kelley been discharged. Nicholas Smith mentions one only by name whom he claims to have been intimidated, one Peter Diffley. And Peter Diffley swears that Kelley never spoke to him, and further that he did not know and had not heard that any of the employés of Kelley were intimidated by anything Kelley said. Mr. George P. Bristol, who was a witness for Mr. Hurd, was at the time of the election, and now, superintendent for Mr. Kelley. He was a Democrat and one of the judges of the October election.

The whole matter of intimidation is summed up in one question and answer in the testimony of Garrett Howard, one of Mr. Hurd's witnesses, at page 100 of the record.

13. Q. Was it generally understood among the men that if Mr. Hurd were elected that Mr. Kelley's business would suffer, and some of them would be discharged?

A. It was just like anything else. Some were of one opinion, and some said it wouldn't, and some said it would.

I also called attention to the sixteenth question and answer of this witness's testimony, as showing Kelley's position in the matter:

16. Q. What did Mr. Kelley say that led you to believe that he was a Republican?

A. Mr. Smith was in the hall and accused him of bulldozing his men. He said he had as good a right to talk to his men and ask them to vote the Republican ticket as men that were in his employ had to electioneer for the Democrats.

Comment and argument are unnecessary. As in the material world so in the operations of the mind, given effects reveal and characterize the causes which produce them. In determining the quality and property of that action by which one mind influences or controls another, the language employed may, indeed, be deceptive, but the intent of the one and the effect upon the other can not fail to lead us into the paths of truth. In this case the intent, the language, and the effect are all in harmony. Mr. Kelley simply and solely expressed his opinion of the effect which Mr. Hurd's election would have on his business. It was so understood by his employés. They were not intimidated. I doubt if a single vote was changed. They voted according to what in their judgment would best subserve their interests.

Such are the conclusions to which I have arrived in the case. I have given to it the most careful and thorough study of which I am capable. I have not been conscious of partisan, certainly not of unfriendly, bias. If I have been unjust or unfair to Mr. Hurd I regret it. I believe the voice of the people was expressed at the polls in this district; that the votes were honestly cast by legal voters; that the vote was counted as cast; and that Mr. Romeis was elected by a substantial majority.

The SPEAKER. The time yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ELY. I would like to have the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GREEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I think that is a mistake. The gentleman from North Carolina spoke twenty-seven minutes yesterday and——

The SPEAKER. How much time did the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Twelve minutes.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman has thirty-two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That is correct. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I do not flatter myself that a single vote will be affected by what I am about to say. But I propose to express my opinion of cant and contempt for moral lectures on party duty and patriotism, which, on each recurring occasion of this sort, are hurled at us from the other side of this House.

Mr. Speaker, Charles Greville, an acute observer of the politics of his time, speaking of the impeachment and trial of Lord Melville, makes this pertinent reflection in his admirable memoirs: "I was struck with the fact that every gentleman of his lordship's party thought and voted him innocent, while every one on the other side believed and voted him guilty." I quote from memory.

What a commentary that upon political bias and party passion. And yet, Mr. Speaker, a brief occupancy of a seat on this floor convinces me that it is in the main well grounded. We see it illustrated in Rome both in the forum and the capitol, and doubly so in the internecine conflicts ensuing, which were the forerunners of the empire. Doubtless, too, it was the case in antecedent states long before Marius and Sylla.

In spite of bathos and the golden rule, poor frail humanity is naturally prone to incline to the side of such as are of a kindred line of thought. At least it is and thus has ever been with our friends across the way. We see them forsooth in the plenitude of power seating Democratic contestants! We see them, "in my mind's eye, Horatio," scrupling to unseat those whom suffragans had seated to make room for others of more than questionable claim! We have seen them unseating Democrats who had been elected by thousands—ay, many thousands! But discarding sarcasm, we have seen a commission composed of Senators, Representatives, and Supreme Court judges overriding the expressed and manifest wish of the constitutional majority of this broad land, placing a pretender, a usurper, a sort of Perkin Warbeck, in the proud position—ay, the proudest when honestly won and worthily worn on this mundane sphere of ours—in utter disregard of the rights of the people and of him whom the people had chosen. Few believed it a righteous decision at the time, and still fewer will maintain it now. Of course party had nothing to do with it!

In view of this, Mr. Speaker, we are constrained to admit that with some at least party ties are not bound with liliputian threads, or party claim the figment of a disordered fancy. Ay, next to the ties which hold men together in the crisis of battle none are made of stronger cord. For one I lay no self-righteous claim to be unfettered by them, and what is more, I do not wish to be, as long as it is patent and apparent that they hold my political foes together with the tenacity of hooks of steel. I have always been afraid, Mr. Speaker, of being better than my neighbors; for next to the devil I hate, loathe, and detest a tyrant, and next to him their twin brother, the ill-begotten offspring of hypocrite and pharisee.

God forbid that I should out-Herod Herod or out-pharisee the pharisees.

Other things being equal, it behooves good, simple, and sinful man to be even like other men, and no better by mere assumption. Other things being equal, from my poor miserable standpoint it behooves him to incline to the side of his friends when the issue is narrowed down and evenly balanced. Other things being equal, if he be a man of sense instead of an Arcadian dreamer, he will be content to walk the earth in his day and generation, and leave to others to attain to that plane of maudlin sentimentalism which enjoins self-immolation and party immolation to evoke the open acclaim but covert sneer of his friends—the enemy. Far be it from me, sir, to enjoin literal imitation of those who judged by the record hold party fealty paramount to the ten laws of Israel's inspired leader or the nine and thirty articles of a later epoch of injunction.

"Fas est ab hoste doceri" is an excellent rule in statecraft or party tactics. But mine be the teaching which in party strife or civil broil inculcates imitation of example instead of precept coming from the other side.

Ay, Mr. Speaker, I am not ashamed to proclaim myself a party man, or, if you prefer, a partisan, to the point that self-contempt would be my legitimate portion did party foes praise, pity, or otherwise cajole me. And so, Mr. Speaker, I approach this question with a degree of bias confessed, which some others feel, but fain would smother or conceal; and yet I trust I approach it dispassionately and with as honest purpose as any on this floor to be guided by facts and the rules of evidence. I approach it with a full conviction, sustained by the facts of the case, that the contestant is entitled to the seat he is claiming. But were I hampered with a doubt, Heaven forefend that I should stretch my conscience to give the benefit of that doubt to the other side.

Justice is justice, and should "be done though the heavens fall." But magnanimity is another thing after the requirements of justice have been answered. Prate not to me of party magnanimity. In man's dealings with his fellow-man, it is beautiful, it is sublime. In party concessions to opposing faction, it is folly—it is worse than folly, it is a blunder; and that, quoth Talleyrand, is worse than a crime. That party whose convictions are worth a pinch of salt should, where issue is joined and principles involved, "a hair divide betwixt the south and southwest side" before conceding the breadth of a hair. That party which wins in a national struggle should stickle for party unity and brotherly accord; and to insure it, should have its parts and props congenial. Antagonistic composition implies discord, and discord driveling, waver, and premature rot. He was a wise kindergarten teacher who, walking in the garden with the young king one day, was asked by his majesty whether he should retain in confidential trust the adherents of his unfriendly predecessor. Replying, not in words, he began to strike off with his cane the heads of the highest poppies. Leave not your enemies about you, and especially those of a larger growth, was the lesson inculcated. The lesson to-day is worthy of illustration, chimeras and cobwebs notwithstanding.

Off with the official heads of overgrown poppies and all such noxious weeds. In the enemy's lexicon, toleration of such implies timidity. In ours, it should import espionage upon those above and disregard of the claims of those below.

"In the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress," I ask, is such vacillating conciliation sound statesmanship or genuine party policy? But, Mr. Speaker, in my zeal for party ends, which I trust imports "my country's, my God's, and truth's," I have been led into digression. Let us now come back to the case of Hurd vs. Romeis and sift the facts with due deliberation. I believe it will be conceded, Mr. Speaker, that fraud, intimidation, and irregularities are among the most essential elements in voiding and vitiating the election of him who employs such agencies, whether it is done by himself or by his adherents.

Now, sir, it has been shown to my entire satisfaction from evidence adduced that each and all of these are conspicuous in the election by which the contestee in this case was given the certificate of election, upon apparent returns, by the slight majority of 239.

Fraud and intimidation are euphonic terms on the tongues of Republicans, and seem to have been specially invented for their political vocabulary to hurl at the heads of us poor-devil Democrats whenever there is a chance of their stealing a seat on this floor or a President by their employment. On such occasions they roll them out with such unctuous fervor that the unthinking world is prone to take them at their claim as the party of high moral ideas and the ninety and nine capital virtues. What we poor sinful creatures consider only moral suasion is with the saints across the way the concentration of fraud, bribery, and corruption. A mild intimation to a "gentleman of color" that his services can be dispensed with after election day is intimidation of the shotgun type. Of course they scorn the use of such base agencies!

Of course railroad magnates, and cotton-spinning lords, and rolling-mill potentates, who are generally of the "unco guid" or Republican persuasion, employing their thousands and tens of thousand, never vote these under the lash of implied threat and starvation consequences sequent. Certainly your little stone-cutter, employing his three or four score of white dependents, would scorn to do it. Of a verity, ward politics in virtuous Ohio towns, like Toledo, for example, are not controlled by filthy shekels and the judicious manipulation of ballots by a blatant pot-house politician. But of course, if such things be, it is for the good of the wage-worker, who is not aware that he would otherwise vote against his true interest! But, sir, if such things be, I humbly submit that the law which applies to South Carolina and Louisiana under Republican potency shall none the less apply to New England, or Pennsylvania, or Ohio elections under the ruling of a Democratic House.

Let us have done with all such confusion of terms, which import one thing in one locality and an entirely different thing in another. Let Republican irregularities be measured by their own bushel. Then, Mr. Speaker, when the vote is taken there will be one more tenant on this side of the House and a corresponding vacancy across the main aisle.

[At the expiration of the fifteen minutes yielded to Mr. GREEN he asked and obtained leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD as above.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the contest in this case arises in the tenth district of the State of Ohio, the returns from which district show that the sitting member, Mr. Romeis, was elected by a majority of 239 votes. That majority was sought to be overcome by the contestant, Mr. Hurd, in his notice of contest by attacking the twenty-three different voting precincts in the city of Toledo, and by attacking Kelley's Island precinct and several other precincts in the different counties throughout the district.

The argument before the committee, and especially the arguments of gentlemen upon this floor, however, have centered upon three distinct propositions. These are the votes in Precinct B of the eighth ward of the city of Toledo, the precinct upon Kelley's Island, and Precinct C in the third ward of the city of Toledo. During the time that I shall occupy the floor in this discussion, Mr. Speaker, I shall devote my remarks to these three propositions which have been raised by gentlemen who seek to secure the seating of Mr. Hurd upon this floor as a member from that district. I shall not take them up in the order in which they have been discussed by the gentleman upon the other side who has just preceded me, but shall first devote my attention to Kelley's Island. That seems to have been the chief point of attack made by the gentleman from Iowa in his remarks this morning.

As a member of the Committee on Elections I have given long and careful attention to the evidence which is adduced by Mr. Hurd in order to disfranchise voters upon that island, and have from that evidence come to a conclusion diametrically opposite that maintained by the gentleman from the State of Iowa in his remarks. I believe, Mr. Speaker, the evidence will not lead to the conclusion drawn by the gentleman from Iowa, by the contestant, Mr. Hurd, or by any of his advocates on this floor. It fails of that character which would warrant the House in disfranchising the voters of that precinct. The men who rely upon that must call in the aid of their imagination for their facts. In dealing with matters of this kind I know of no better guide than those which spring from experience and observation in the ordinary matters of life.

The charge is made that upon this island Mr. Kelley, a man who had a large number of laboring men in his employment, succeeded in intimidating them into voting against their own convictions and in voting for Mr. Romeis as against Mr. Hurd. It has been my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, for many years to reside in a city and Congressional district where large manufacturing interests are centered, and where many hundreds—ay, thousands—of men go daily to their employment, and it is my experience and observation that this class of men are the least susceptible to such influences.

I think the workingmen of America are more independent, that they have more integrity and more character, than is usually assigned to them by those who think they can be intimidated into voting against their convictions, or believe them capable of being influenced in favor of their employer by unworthy means. The glory of this country is its free institutions, and the fact that all the avenues in business, politics, and the professions are as open and inviting to the hod-carrier's son as to the son of his rich neighbor. It is a knowledge of this which makes the laborer a more enterprising and independent man. He looks forward to the day when his sons and daughters can take a little better and higher position in life than the one filled by himself. And as a result he reads more, thinks more, and is freer and more independent than the laborers of the Old World.

In my own home the men who are employed in the railroad shops and in the different mills and manufactories are a class of citizens whom any man may well be proud to represent in this House. The majority of those who have reached middle life own their own homes, their houses are well furnished, and their hearth-stones are the centers of comfort and happiness. Their children have grown up useful and intelligent citizens. Their boys and girls who have a taste for an education have the facilities under our splendid common-school system of acquiring it. And now some of our most prosperous young business men, brightest young lawyers, and successful physicians are sons of mechanics who work in the shops and mills. Such men, Mr. Speaker, can not be driven to the polls at the behest of any man or set of men. They realize and appreciate the dignity of labor, and act and think for themselves.

The evidence in this case when it is properly considered, in my judgment, will bear out the statement I have made. No man can read the testimony of any of the men who testified in regard to what took place on election day on Kelleys' Island without being impressed with the idea that those men, long before the day of election, discussed this matter among themselves. They discussed the respective merits of Mr. Hurd and Mr. Romeis. They discussed the great economic questions which have divided parties since the earliest history of our Federal Government, and these men, in their plain, unpretentious way, came to the true and logical conclusion that the interests of the employer and employé are identical. They came to the conclusion that the opinions that were advocated by Mr. Hurd were not in harmony with the best interests of the laboring people of America; and that opinion of theirs was carried out on election day by voting against Mr. Hurd and for Mr. Romeis.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I go into an examination of the evidence I desire to call the attention of the House to the law governing cases of this character. Mr. McCrary, in his able work on elections, in speaking on this subject, uses the following language:

> Where it is alleged that a large number of persons have been deterred from voting by violence and intimidation, the testimony of these persons, or some of them, should be produced. The opinions and impressions of others are not sufficient upon this point. The report of Norris vs. Handley, in the Forty-second Congress, is as follows:

I will not stop to read that. But it carries out the doctrine that is announced by Mr. McCrary.

I am aware that in the minority report, which bears the ear-marks of Mr. Hurd, they cite two cases in the Forty-fourth Congress which they claim bear out the doctrine that all that is necessary is to show an attempted intimidation. One is the case of Ford vs. Abbott; the other the case of Goode vs. Platt. I have examined both of those cases with great care, and I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that those cases are not in point, and that the principle of law which they announce is not applicable here. In the case of Goode vs. Platt, which arose from one of the Congressional districts in Virginia, the point raised was this: At the Norfolk navy-yard they employed nine hundred men regularly. Just before the Congressional election the Republicans added six hundred more men, with the understanding, as was claimed by the parties who testified, that those men were to vote for a certain candidate for Congress, and they voted and the contest was made upon that. They held that there was a bargain and sale between these employed men and the parties who put them there. That is not intimidation, but a species of bribery.

In the case of Ford vs. Abbott it was not a question as to whether the others had been intimidated, but the charge was made that bribery had influenced the votes.

I want to call the attention of gentlemen upon the Democratic side to this: that this law which I have read to you, as stated by Mr. McCrary, is the settled law in this country. It is the settled law of this House, and it is the law that you ought to take and by which every member ought to be guided in giving his vote on the issue that is presented in this case. If you do that, there is no need of my taking any further time in discussing the case so far as relates to the precinct on Kelley's Island.

No witness has been produced by Mr. Hurd to show that a single voter was intimidated on that island. No witness has been produced who has shown that by reason of the influence of Mr. Kelley any man was debarred from voting as he saw fit. On the contrary, the evidence of almost all the witnesses is to the effect that the men that were Democrats before voted the Democratic ticket. I know that one of the gentlemen who addressed the House yesterday, I think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN], cited the evidence of Peter Diffley. Mr. Diffley testified in this case, and if any member will take the time to read his evidence he will find he voted the Democratic ticket; and that is the only man upon Kelley's Island who was named. I shall take no further time on this question of Kelley's Island, but I call the attention of Democratic members to this principle of law and to the statement I have made that no proof has been brought to show that a single voter voted otherwise than according to his plain political convictions.

The next point to which I desire to call the attention of the House is in regard to Precinct B of the eighth ward of Toledo. The charges made in the notice are bribery of a general character, bribery of individual voters, and such uncertainty in the returns that the entire precinct ought to be thrown out. In that precinct there was a majority for Mr. Romeis of 220 votes.

I will take up these propositions which have been presented by Mr. Hurd and his adherents upon this floor in the order in which I have stated.

What is the evidence in regard to general bribery? I wish Democratic members to understand that this charge of bribery is something which affects the character of Democrats as well as Republicans. You gentlemen are as much interested in seeing that this charge is carefully looked into as any Republican.

If the Republican has been guilty of bribery, then according to the statement of Mr. Hurd it is the Democrat who has been bribed. Are you prepared to say by your votes to-day that the Democrats of the city of Toledo are so base and corrupt, and have become so politically debauched, that they can be bought and sold like sheep in the shambles? Are you prepared to say that the Democrats of the city of Toledo and the tenth Congressional district of the State of Ohio are so lost to all political principle that they can be driven hither and thither as the bosses may direct or as money may indicate? That is the proposition that is presented to you, and it is presented upon the evidence of a man by the name of Gerstmann. I would like to have every member of this House read the testimony of that man and trace the history of his life. The story as told by himself shows that the trail of the serpent is over it all. It shows that he has a worse character than that of Shylock as depicted by Shakspeare. A man without a country, as he himself confesses, without a home, without a religion, without a party, and without principle; that is the kind of witness that Mr. Hurd has brought here, and upon whose testimony he asks you to put the mark of Cain upon three or four hundred voters in the city of Toledo. I ask you Democrats of this House if you are prepared to disgrace three or four hundred fellow-Democrats in that fair city in the State of Ohio upon the evidence of a man of that character—a man who, during the late war, in order to escape conscription in the confederate army, took to himself the sacred robes of a Jewish rabbi.

That is the kind of man upon whose testimony Mr. Hurd relies on this point. Later on, from 1870 to 1884, he is like the bird of passage—you can not find him, his church, or his congregation. When he is cross-examined as to where he preached and who his congregation were, he pointed the examiner to a vacant church and a congregation that had all died.

That is the kind of man and that is the character of evidence that Mr. Hurd has introduced here to impeach Democratic voters and show that they were debauched by Republican money. I say that while Republicans upon this side would not believe from evidence of that character that fellow-Republicans were guilty of such an offense, you are equally interested to protect the fair name and fame of the Democratic party of the State of Ohio from the foul aspersions cast upon it by the evidence of this renegade Jew, Gerstmann.

Gentlemen, I shall occupy no more time on that branch of the case. This Gerstmann is the only witness that is produced in support of the charge. I have had some experience in courts of justice in the prosecution and in the defense of men charged with crime, but I have never seen a court of justice disgraced by such a disreputable witness.

The other branch of the charge, individual bribery, rests upon the evidence of a man named Louis Jahn. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN], in his remarks yesterday, stated that Jahn was a Republican. I deny that he is a Republican. He is a renegade; he is more of a Democrat than a Republican, and yet I would not disgrace the Democratic party by claiming that he is a Democrat. He has reached that high state known as Mugwumpism. From the time of Judas Iscariot down to the days of modern Mugwumpism, you will always find the most despicable characters among that class of men. Mr. Hurd could not get a Democrat to swear to individual bribery in that precinct. He had to go among the Mugwumps to get a man to give the testimony he desired.

Now, what is the evidence of Jahn? In his direct examination he swears like "the army in Flanders" upon the fraudulent use of money to carry the precinct, but when he was cross-examined his evidence showed that at the time when, as he undertook to testify, Mr. Gates, a Republican, was paying from $3 to $10 apiece to nineteen different men, he (Jahn) was off in some other locality, so that his testimony was entirely hearsay—he knew nothing about it. Every man that has looked into a law-book understands that hearsay evidence is not competent proof; and if you invoke the rules of law which usually govern proceedings of this kind, the evidence of this man Jahn must be entirely excluded. But I say, as did the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE] yesterday, that if you take this evidence and give it the highest coloring that Mr. Hurd or his adherents on this floor can give it, it simply means this: that in this large precinct in the city of Toledo, a city of from fifty to sixty thousand inhabitants, these nineteen men were employed as ticket peddlers, not to corrupt voters, but for the purpose of seeing that every man who desired to cast his ballot on that occasion was furnished with a ballot; not to corrupt the polls, but to see that the thugs and gutter-snipes, who have rendered the city of Cincinnati almost infamous, should be relegated to the rear, and that honest men could go to the polls and vote according to their convictions for the candidates whom they believed would carry out their political principles.

The third proposition that is made by Mr. Hurd and by the minority of the Committee on Elections is in regard to the question of uncertainty in this precinct. They claim the result is so uncertain that no man can tell the number of votes that were cast. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us for a moment look at the evidence on this point. In the testimony which was taken, the tally-sheet which I now hold in my hand was used as an exhibit. This tally-sheet shows that at that precinct 103 votes were cast for Mr. Hurd and 323 for Mr. Romeis, leaving a majority of 220 for Mr. Romeis. Now the trouble arose in this way: When the officers had finally counted the number of ballots in the box they found that there was a deficiency of 4 as compared with the number of names on the poll-book; and the only uncertainty is in regard to this deficiency of 4, and an excess of 7 which there was on the first count.

That excess of 7 in the number of ballots as compared with the number of names on the poll-book is accounted for in this way: The ballots were taken out and counted by two different judges and their results added together. Anybody who has had experience in matters of this kind knows the uncertainty of that character of count. Those tickets were then placed back in the box; and Mr. Kelley, the Democratic judge of the precinct, testifies that they were counted out one by one. Mr. Jahn took them and handed them to the other judge; and Mr. Kelley strung them on a string. When they took care in this way, they found that the ballots were 4 fewer than the number of names on the poll-book; and they found that the majority of Mr. Romeis was 220, just as I have indicated.

Now, there is no uncertainty there. It is plain from the evidence adduced, upon which the House can act, that the majority of Mr. Romeis, on the number of votes counted, was 220. But these judges of election desired to have the tally-sheet correspond with the poll-book; and on motion of this man Jahn, the man who has attempted to impeach and destroy the vote at that precinct, 2 votes were added to each of the candidates, increasing the 426 votes to 430. Now, that this did not operate at all to the injury of Mr. Hurd is apparent from this tally-sheet, which I hold in my hand. Members can see that upon this occasion there were some twenty candidates in all voted for, taking the Republicans and Democrats together; and what was true in Mr. Romeis's case was equally true in regard to the secretary of state, the judge of the supreme court, and all the other candidates. So that Mr. Romeis is in the same condition with these other men who received their certificates and are filling the offices to which they were elected by the suffrages of the people of that district.

On every principle of law and justice the vote of this precinct must stand.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE].

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, the poet Tennyson has said:

Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay.

I do not want to talk to a House that does not listen to me; and I hope the time which may be consumed in bringing the House to order will not be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday we were treated to a very singular phenomenon. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] came forward voluntarily as a witness to the good character of one S. Gerstmann. That I may not do the gentleman from Missouri any injustice I propose to read what he said yesterday:

For several years—I will not say how many, but certainly as many as four—Rev. Mr. Gerstmann was the Jewish rabbi ministering to the people to whom I have alluded. He ministered ably and successfully, and, so far as I know, to the entire satisfaction of the citizens of Saint Joseph, especially of those who worshiped in his synagogue.

Now, that was a rare witness. I wish my friend from Missouri were present, because I propose to introduce a witness better even than himself in regard to the character of this man Gerstmann. Whom do you suppose I am about to introduce? Mr. Gerstmann himself. Mr. Gerstmann, take the stand! What do you say about yourself? Now, I ask every gentleman on the other side of the House to listen to what Gerstmann swears about Gerstmann:

Q. I understand you to say that you were in Savannah, Ga., in 1870. How long did you continue to live there?
A. I quitted it in 1870.
Q. Have you been back there since?
A. For a few months to visit my sister; I had a sister living there.
Q. What is her name?
A. I refuse to answer.

Why not? Do you suppose any decent man in America would be ashamed to tell the name of his sister? What does Gerstmann say?

A. She is in the graveyard.
Q. What was her name when she did live?
A. I decline to answer.
Q. What was there about your residence in Savannah, Ga., that leads you to refuse to answer these questions?
A. I decline to answer.

[Laughter.]

Hold on for a moment, gentlemen; that is not all. I wish my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] was here now:

Q. Will the criminal records down there develop any reason why you had better not?
A. I decline to answer.

Mr. WOLFORD rose.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I have but a few moments myself, and can not yield to any interruption.

Now hear what Gerstmann swears about Gerstmann:

Q. Will the criminal records down there develop any reason why you had better not?

That is, will the criminal records down there when you resided in Savannah, Ga., give any reason why you had better not answer? Well, what was his answer?

A. I decline to answer.

But let us go on. Where have you been since 1860, when the war began, when you refused to go into the confederate service, when you assumed the robes of a Jewish rabbi to get out of it; where have you been? Well, I lived in Arkansas, at Helena. When? After I left Savannah. What other places did you live at? He could not tell.

And this is Gerstmann, and not my friend BURNES, of Missouri. What do you say, Gerstmann; where did you live? I do not know what other places I lived at. That is the only place I know of. [Laughter and applause.]

Gentlemen, do you tell me this man Gerstmann told the truth? Do you tell me he was honest?

Mr. BURNES says Gerstmann lived four years in Saint Joseph. Gerstmann swears he does not remember where he lived after 1870 except in Helena, Ark.

Gentlemen, I put it to the clear intellects of the men before me, do you believe that story? I will tell you I do not, and I do not believe any honest man on this floor believes what Gerstmann says.

We can rely on what our brother BURNES says. But recollect when you strike out Precinct B of ward 8 of the city of Toledo you have got to rely on this man Gerstmann.

Hold on for a moment. I am not dead yet, nor done yet. This is Gerstmann's statement about what he knows about Gerstmann:

Q. You did not enter the confederate service?
A. No, sir; I did not.
Q. You used your clerical robes to protect you from military duty?
A. Yes, sir.

[Laughter and applause.]

Let me go still further:

Q. You did preside over a church?
A. I presided over one; yes, sir.
Q. How long did you continue to preside over that church?
A. I decline to answer.

Think of it—a clergyman ashamed to tell how long he presided over a church. [Laughter.]

Q. How long did you continue in the clerical work at Savannah?
A. I decline to answer.

But let us go on and see what else we can find:

Q. Give us the names of the leading members of that congregation there.
A. They are all dead. I am the only living member left.

[Great laughter and applause.]

That is to be found on page 119 of the testimony. I turn over to the next page, and I find the following:

Q. How many times have you been in prison since 1870?
A. I don't think I was any time in prison.
Q. You don't, eh?

[Laughter and applause.]

Q. Are you positive of that?
A. I am not positive of that.

Oh, gentlemen! [Laughter and applause.] Gentlemen of this House, Americans, do you believe this Wandering Jew, who says he can not recollect whether he was in prison or not! I know you do not believe him, and you know we do not believe, any one of us, what he says.

Q. Where did you preach last? Is it anything to be ashamed of?
A. I decline to answer.

[Laughter.]

And this is your man Gerstmann! What does this man know about the fraud in that precinct (B) when he swears he went to the Republican headquarters in New York and they would not give him any money. And then he swears he went to the Democratic headquarters, and they would not give him any money. What do you know? How will you cast out the vote of Precinct B? I want you to listen to it, and then I hope as mere partisans you will find he is a saint among saints.

Now, thank God, this is not a political question. Honorable gentlemen, who are strong Democrats, are entirely united with me in saying we can not believe this creature Gerstmann. He is an Israelite of whom it could never be said: "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!"

What do you know about his evidence, for I am going to read you a sentence, upon which the case must turn, of your Gerstmann in regard to Precinct B of ward 8 in the city of Toledo—what do you think of it? And listen, if you please, while I read. You will find it on page 117 of the evidence.

A. From the conversations that I had with those people, and from the change of feelings and their countenances—

Mr. Speaker, I hope I may have the attention of the House for the few moments I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. [Great laughter.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. I would like to read this by common consent. It is the answer of Gerstmann. [Cries of "Read!"] Then I will read.

Mr. TURNER. I have not interposed any objection myself to the gentleman proceeding with his remarks; but it must be the distinct understanding that the time he occupies shall not come from the side of the majority.

The SPEAKER. How long a time is the gentleman willing to yield?

Mr. PETTIBONE. I do not want more than half a minute.

Mr. TURNER. I can not yield any time to come out of the time of the majority.

The SPEAKER. How long will the gentleman yield, provided it does not come out of that time?

Mr. TURNER. I will not split hairs about a half a minute, but I think the debate ought to end at the time fixed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed, the time taken not to come out of the eight hours.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I will read:

A. From the conversations that I had with those people, and from the change of feelings and their countenances, I could see, I supposed, that their desires had been satisfied, or something in that way. Of course they did not come expressly out, but from that I could infer that something was done to poison their minds, or to poison their ideas, and that can only be done with money, I suppose. That is according to my ideas, but I was not there, and I had nothing to do with the funds.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I have the unanimous consent of the House of course to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Then, sir, I conclude as follows: It appears that unless this witness Gerstmann can be believed—not only as to what he swears to, but also as to what he surmises—this case of Hurd vs. Romeis must practically go by the board. But it is evident that either he is a great liar, or he has a wofully incompetent memory. If he is a common liar, he can not be believed. If he can not recollect, as he swears, whether he has ever been in prison; if he can not recollect whether for four years he was a rabbi to the Jewish synagogue at Saint Joseph, Mo., as our brother BURNES swears he was; if he can not recollect any possible fact that would impeach his moral character, so that in decency he can not be believed, then it is evident he is nothing less than a drivveling idiot. If he is not, then he is a knave and self-confessed perjurer.

I leave the dilemma to be solved by those who profess to believe him. I think that he is simply

A wandering mass of rank, unwieldy woe.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I think, saying it with entire deference, that the difference between the majority report and the arguments made on the floor in support of it, and the report of the minority and the arguments made on the floor in support of it, is the difference of looking at facts in detail and looking at them as a whole; between taking them up separately and ascertaining from a separate examination of them the value of each as an isolated fact, and taking them up in their concatenated relation as a whole.

I admit, after a most careful examination of these three reports and the briefs filed for the contestant and contestee, that if each fact be taken up by itself and isolated from all that went before and all that came after, it is not sufficient of itself standing alone to base a verdict upon. But upon the reading of all these papers I can not avoid the conclusion that taking them as a whole, concatenated as a series, it is beyond cavil that the seat occupied by the sitting member was not given to him by the voice of the people at an election held according to law.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I have not time. If I have time left to do so, I will yield to the gentleman to ask me a question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I judge if that celebrated and historic fox that stood at the mouth of the lion's den, hesitating as to whether he should accept the hospitable invitation to dinner, could have heard an argument of some friend of that lion that he ought not to put too much weight, attach too much importance to the individual tracks, that really no one track meant anything; that certainly no one of them ought to overturn the presumption that the royal lion was honest, and anyhow such evidence was illegal, not in accordance with the precedents in the books of the realm, he would have listened to an argument as acute, as keen, and as conclusive as the arguments we have heard on this floor.

But it was all the tracks, leading all in the same direction, that preserved that fox on that occasion from that celebrated feast; and so, Mr. Speaker, it is in this case.

Upon the doctrine of probabilities, Precinct B of ward 8 of the city of Toledo could by no accident have so many incidents that need explanation; and I desire, in what I intend to submit, merely to group these incidents which require explanation, and show that they are too numerous and that they are too much alike; that they follow each other in their logical order; that they belong in their proper places, and that necessarily they had but one result, and that result was accomplished. I care not who the witness Gerstmann is; but if a man were to come and say, "Watch Precinct B, ward 8; there is going to be something done there, and I know that is the ward that is selected," that is a fact wholly independent of the character of the witness, and he is sustained or he is refuted by what occurs subsequently thereto.

For if it be true that a particular ward is selected as the arena for a particular class of operations, if it be true that these operations are to be in a sequence, that in essence they are that money shall be put into the ward for the purpose of changing its ordinary political voice from one side to the other, then if that be successful certain results will follow.

Now the initial step of this proceeding, the very "beginning corner" of this survey, is that Precinct B of ward 8 was selected as the place where money was to be put and where the operations were to be performed. And the evidence is persuasive that the Republican committee of the city and the national Republican committee united in both the selection and the accomplishment of this purpose. I have not time to present that evidence; but it is positive, it is circumstantial, and it is corroborated by the silence of those accused, who knew of the accusation, had opportunity to testify, and failed so to do.

Secondly, upon the doctrine of probabilities, in any other ward in that whole district it would be equally likely that the judges and officers would be selected contrary to law; but if this ward had been selected, then it would follow that there you would expect to find an illegal selection, and we find two judges are Republicans and the Democratic judge is a non-resident of the precinct.

This is the beginning. But what next? We go a step further; and in that particular election in that district for this office there is a dissatisfied element of the Democratic party, so that the dissatisfied Democratic element may be the element from which the non-resident judge has been selected. And you further find that the two clerks in that particular precinct, instead of being of opposite and separate parties, were selected as belonging to the Republican party. It is said that this is not absolutely illegal, and that there is a hypothesis that makes it legal. I grant you that is true; but is it not remarkable that that unexplained and unproven hypothesis should happen to occur in connection with a ward which has been selected to be tampered with at an election at which the judges are selected contrary to the spirit of the law?

Let us go a step further. It would be if honestly done, if there was no design in it, that the election in that precinct would be like all the elections in all of the other precincts; that when the ballot-box is opened the law of Ohio, which is an exceedingly plain, well-drawn, and well-guarded system, would be obeyed. If, on the other hand, that had been selected for the attempted manipulation, that manipulation would be seen when the ballot-box is opened and even before it is opened; for by the law of Ohio the poll-book is to be signed before the ballot-box is opened. There was a mere irregularity, it is claimed, in this respect. Grant it. But this irregularity in all of the lines, in all of the tracks, was in the same direction—all going into the lion's den. It is an irregularity that opens the way to fraud.

The statute explicitly requires that the poll-book is to be signed by the two clerks before the ballot-box is opened, so that the book shall stand upon its own record and the ballot-box shall stand upon its own count. Now, I repeat, the poll-book is not signed, and the reason is obvious. It is that if these selected officials, these judges and these two clerks, both of the same party, failed to do their duty, and a fraud is contemplated, there may be the means of carrying it out, so if there be a manipulation of the vote there may be a method found for making that manipulation successful. Then the ballot-box is opened. The law of Ohio in this regard and with respect to counting the ballots is, in my judgment, mandatory. I submit to the great names in our profession that have drawn that distinction, which I have long considered dangerous, between directory and mandatory provisions, it is doctrine which puts the judge-made law above the legislative will. It is this doctrine, which has been so bent and twisted for those "hard cases," which makes shipwreck of the science of jurisprudence. But assuming that the law of Ohio in this respect is not mandatory, it does not weaken the force of the thought I desire to submit.

It is the duty of those judges when they open that box for one of them to take a ballot singly out of the ballot-box, open it before the crowd assembled there who may choose to witness the transaction, read it, pass it to his brother judge, who reads it aloud and passes it to the third judge, who strings it.

There have been words dropped in this argument which I do not understand. They speak of "an informal count of a ballot." And what is an informal count of a ballot but an illegal tampering with a ballot.

There is no such thing as an informal count of the ballot which represents the voice and will of the people. As I have said, all that these men can lawfully do is for one of them to take each ballot singly out of the box, read it, pass it to his brother judge, who reads it and passes it to the third, who strings it. Now, it might be according to the doctrine of probabilities that ignorant judges might be found in that precinct as well as in others. But how does it happen they are found in no other precinct than that; that in this particular precinct, selected, as Gerstmann says, for manipulation, there should be these judges (one a non-resident of the precinct), these clerks of the same party, these ballots counted illegally—that all this irregularity is found in that precinct?

Then we go one step further. Between that ballot-box and that unsigned poll-book is an irreconcilable discrepancy. And those ballots are taken out, laid on the table, put in piles, first, as one of the reports says, according to politics; then divided in subpiles of five, and then counted; every step being an illegal step; every step being a step open to fraud and giving opportunity to commit it.

And now see the result of all—a Democratic precinct giving a majority of 70 gives a Republican majority of 220. The selection was wise; the means effective; the result accomplished. Shall we now declare it to have been legal, proper in its conception, lawful in its progress and execution, praiseworthy in its success?

I say when you group these series of facts there is but one fair conclusion to draw from them. When you look out of a window and see a feather floating by you do not need to have the swaying of a whole forest to know the wind is from the east. When the cook brings on the table bread beautifully risen, you do not need to be told about the yeast that has been used to produce this effect. And so at this feast, with these facts before you, you do not need to be told there has been leaven put in this measure of meal; you can well judge, from the form of bread that comes out, what culinary operation has been resorted to.

I say by every principle of law that ballot ought to be thrown out. Then if it is to be thrown out, ought the election to be declared void? I say, emphatically, no. The election in each precinct is a separate election. Each precinct holds its own polls. Each precinct has its separate judges, and the election which is void is the election about which we have been investigating, about which these things can be said. Quoad hoc the election is void, but only so far as that ballot-box and that precinct are involved.

I do not intend to go into the other questions, but they illustrate how what I have said about this precinct is corroborated by what happens in the others. In another precinct a gentleman by the name of Bell handles the ballots. In another there is the intimidation of Kelley. These acts in all of these precincts being in favor of the one candidate and all against the other, the contestant.

The question as to Kelly's Island stands upon a somewhat different footing; not hostile, but only dissimilar. For all these principles find their common root in the great principle that an election is the free deposit of the ballots of free voters in the ballot-box at a time designated by law, at a place appointed by law, in a mode prescribed by law. We must not lose sight of that principle amid our discussions. That is an election, and that only is an election, which is a deposit of the free ballot of a free voter freely exercising his choice, deposited on a prescribed day, at an appointed place, in accordance with designated modes. All these must concur. Of course there must be some flexibility in the application of the rules of law. There must be evidence to establish the great fact whether there has been such an election.

But the preliminary inquiry, the one that lies at the very beginning of all investigation, is this question: Are they the votes of those who deposited them, or are they the votes of somebody else who makes them be deposited? Now, that is the sole question of the Kelley's Island precinct. In my mind intimidation is a word of vast and irregular and uncertain meaning. What will intimidate one man has no effect upon another. It has been said in one of the old cases, and eloquently said, by a gentleman who is still on this floor, that "a threat to starve is a greater and meaner threat than a threat to murder." A bringing of the pressure of losing wages to the wage-earner out of whose sweat must be coined the bread and raiment of those who are dependent upon him is a worse intimidation than all the racks and tortures that ever were devised, the one most certain to break his spirit and break his heart. And they never come in these cases in direct language.

They are never so openly made as to be entirely taken hold of. You can not measure them; you can not exactly weigh them; you have to ascertain them by the ordinary means by which you ascertain subtile and invisible powers. The greatest forces in nature are those subtile and invisible forces which are so potential; and this power over the mind of man by this subtile appeal to his heart and to his necessities is not like a threat of personal violence; it is not like corporal punishment, capable always of exact proof; it is like the illustrations which I have tried to submit, capable of proof only by a series of connected links.

Here are the men in the employ of Mr. Kelley, here is Mr. Kelley saying that to vote in a certain way will be against his interests, here he is adding that those in his employ who vote that way will be the first to be discharged, here he is at the polls when the votes are deposited, here he is complaining that one of them is deposited against him; there is the majority against the man that he is against for the man that he is for, and that at a precinct habitually Democratic. What further proof is required? You do not have to eat the whole leg of mutton to get the taste of the meat or to know the quality of the cook; you do not have to enter every chamber to know the character of the house.

Agassiz from a single fin could construct the whole fish from which it came, and ex pede Herculem is an old Latin maxim expressing the same thought. Here is the employer, here is the employé, here are the necessities of the employé, here is the influence of the employer, here are his expressions, here is his conduct at the polls, here are the votes cast; there is the result—defeat for the man he is against, success for the man he is for. You may tear the argument to pieces; you may isolate the facts, and say there is nothing in this or in that; you can break each fagot; but I deny that there is any legal or intellectual acumen strong enough to break the whole bundle of fagots when you tie them together in your mind and examine them as a connected whole.

Mr. Speaker, it is for these reasons and these reasons alone that it seems to me that the contestant ought to be given his seat. I admit that we ought to be careful with the ballot-box. I not only admit it, sir, but I think the great crying danger of the American Republic is that the omnipotent power of the law seems hardly enough to keep sacred the ballot-box.

I would be glad if some divine power could always guard the ballot-box, in which and through which alone the voice of a free people can be freely heard, and when it is once established that the voice is the august voice of the free, it ought to be obeyed. But the way to keep it sacred is to say that when it is the voice of fraud, when it is made to utter a lie, when it is surrounded by those who manipulate it, when base priests nominally worship at that altar but worship for base purposes, that those for whom these outrages are perpetrated shall receive no benefit therefrom.

Let no title to a seat in this House be secured by such muniments. Let it be once more proclaimed that there can be no election to this House at the dictation of the employer to the employed. Once more solemnly declare that there is no place in American jurisprudence for rules of so-called law by means of which fraud can be successful and wrong triumphant. We will this day perform a righteous and far-reaching act if we determine that the voice of Jacob shall not deceive us into any surrender of our birthright. It is thus and thus alone that we can preserve the purity of the ballot-box; thus and thus alone can we make perpetual our determination that its voice shall be honestly heard and its behests loyally obeyed.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I am not in charge of the interests of the minority of the committee, but I desire now to advertise them that this is the last hour to which they are entitled, and if it is their wish, I will now ask unanimous consent that the contestant be heard for one hour.

There was no objection.

Mr. HURD (contestant). Mr. Speaker, in a cause in the result of which I have such a deep personal interest I hesitate to address this House. If it were a mere question of the occupancy of the seat of the sitting member from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio I should be silent; but I can not rest under the imputation of seeking a seat to which I have not been elected, relying upon a partisan friendly majority.

To vindicate the course I have pursued in making this contest, to show to this House and to the American people that I have good cause to claim that I have been elected to this Congress, a sense of duty to myself, to my friends, to the constituency which has so often honored me, and to the members of this House, compels me to speak to-day. Nor do I overlook the interest which the public has in the question which I shall discuss. Above and beyond the interest which either the sitting member or I have in this controversy is the interest of the public. It makes but little difference who the legislator is, provided the sources of his power be pure and uncontaminated. Vastly above and greater than the question, Who is the Representative? is that other question, Has the election on which he relies been free? For without pure and free elections the Republic is like the splendors of tropical bloom when the fragrance and the colors have departed.

In what I shall say to-day I shall indicate the penalty which offended selfishness attempted to impose upon the honest advocacy of a cause believed to be true. I shall point out the paths through which monopoly and ill-gotten wealth are pressing to throttle free discussion. I shall show the methods by which the public will, in one district at least, was attempted to be thwarted. And whatever the result of this contest to me personally, I shall not consider this occasion altogether lost if it shall enable me, even in the slightest degree, to arouse public attention to the great danger which is brooding over free institutions in the poisoning of the ballot-box through corruption and the enslavement of labor through terrorism at the polls.

Several grounds were assigned in the notice of contest on which my claim to a seat is based. I shall only consider two: those which grow out of the assailment of Precinct B, in ward 8, of the city of Toledo, and Kelley's Island.

There is no doubt of the power of this House to reject an entire precinct. Each election precinct is a separate and independent political division. It has its own machinery, its own officers, its own elections. When the voting is finished its return is made out and sent to the canvassing officers, who make a general return. This general return is based on these particular returns, and presupposes that each one of these is true. When the return so sent from a precinct is false or fraudulent or uncertain, or when it appears that no election has been held, then the entire return should be rejected by any tribunal which has jurisdiction to review the election.

There is no dispute as to the principles of law by which the conduct of the House should be governed in rejecting an entire poll. The return is merely the prima facie evidence of the result of the election. Unassailed it is sufficient to authorize it to be counted in the general return; but when attacked successfully for falseness or fraud or uncertainty, then it ceases to be evidence for any purpose whatever. Verity can never be imparted to falseness; definiteness can never be predicated of uncertainty; integrity can never be attributed to fraud; and therefore when the return has been attacked and impeached successfully, for either of these reasons the entire poll must be rejected. Then he who relies upon the vote of the precinct is left to prove by other testimony what the result of the election is.

If he expects that the poll of the precinct shall be counted for him, the burden of proof is upon him to show by evidence aliunde what the true vote is; and this evidence must establish every material fact necessary to make a valid election. Applying these principles to the case in hand, I inquire is there anything in the election in this precinct in Toledo and in Kelley's Island which will justify this House in throwing out the entire vote of each?

First, I wish to call your attention to the conduct of the officers of election at Precinct B, ward 8, of Toledo, after the polls were closed. The law of Ohio provides, that as soon as the election is over the total number of votes shall be ascertained by the officers, who shall figure up the poll-books and sign and certify to the same. The tickets are to remain in the ballot-box until this has been done. Thereupon the box is to be opened and the tickets taken out one by one, and the names of the candidates read by one of the judges, while the ticket is in his hand. This shall be continued until a number of tickets shall have been taken from the box equal to the number of names on the poll-books. Then the counting ceases, and if more tickets are left they remain uncounted in the box.

In this case not one provision of the law on this subject was regarded. The poll-books were not signed until after the final count had been completed, so the foundation was never laid for the counting contemplated by the statute. Instead of the judges seeking to make the tickets agree with the poll-books, they endeavored to make the poll-books agree with the tickets. In other words, they learned the number of tickets before they had learned the number of voters.

The ballots did not remain in the box until the poll-books had been signed. But they were, immediately after the close of the polls, thrown upon the table, around which were crowded thirty persons. These ballots, while thus out of the place where they were required to be, were counted over informally twice. The result showed seven more tickets than names. After they had thus been unlawfully exposed for a considerable time, the judges put the tickets back into the box preparatory to beginning the general count—not the tickets, but "what was left of them," as stated by Jahn, a Republican judge.

Instead of taking the tickets out one by one, they were taken out in quantities and arranged in four piles on the table, from which they were counted by fives. At the end of the count they were five tickets short.

The judges, after considerable delay, added two tallies to each candidate without any tickets in the box to correspond to them.

This count, which ought to have been finished by 9 o'clock in the evening, was not concluded until 1 o'clock in the morning. The judges, tired and mad, at last signed the certificates, and it was then remarked that the whole vote would probably have to be thrown out.

These facts are not disputed, but it is said in the report of the majority of the committee that these are mere irregularities which do not avoid the election. But I answer, what confidence shall be given to the acts of officers who have violated every provision of the law which was intended to secure the purity of the election? The presumption on which official acts are received is that the officer has obeyed the law and done his duty; but when he is proved to have violated the law and not to have done his duty, then no trust is to be given to anything that he has done.

Of what value are laws governing elections if they are to be disregarded with impunity? Of what force is the obligation of an oath, if it imposes no duty on the conscience of an officer? Is the return of a man who does his whole duty and makes a perfect return to be of no more verity in the general count than the return of a man who has violated his oath and failed to do his duty? Is there no difference between public honesty and public crime in the conduct of an election?

It is said that these provisions of the Ohio statute are directory, and that the individual voters ought not to be punished for the mistakes of the officers of the election. This is true, I admit, if you can find the result of this election by other testimony than that of the officers of the election. Here is the duty which the law devolves upon the sitting member—that he shall show affirmatively, when the return has been impeached, what the true vote is.

I do not suppose there will be any difference between lawyers on the proposition that when these irregularities and this misconduct have resulted in uncertainty as to what the true vote was the return should not be counted; then it must be rejected; because, if the result has not been ascertained, there has been no election. In this case the return affords no evidence of the result of the election, because it is false. This is shown by the testimony of one of the judges:

Q. You say that this certificate is false, do you not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You knew that the certificate was false to the poll-book when you signed it, did you not?
A. Yes, sir.

No words of mine can add to the force of these statements. I do not care in what the falseness consisted. The return is fatally impeached. The maxim falsum in uno, falsum in omnibus applies especially to official acts. If a man charged with a public trust is shown to have been negligent of his duty and regardless of his oath, you can not put any confidence in anything that he may do.

To count this precinct for the sitting member, you must count this lie. His whole title to the majority here rests upon an uncontradicted falsehood. Shall the true returns from the honest precincts be overcome by the falseness of this one?

But it is said that this falseness consisted merely in adding 2 votes to each candidate, which did not change their relative votes.

But what relative vote? There is no relative vote, except that fixed by the very officers whose conduct is under impeachment. It is plain that nothing that they have done can be accepted as evidence for any purpose of the election.

But the falseness is more than in the addition of the two tallies. It affects every declaration which the officers of election were required to make. The statement it contained as to the total number of votes, both before and after the addition, was false. One of the judges testifies that the total vote was not as appeared on the poll-books, but considerably less. The statement of the vote given for me was false. The statement of the vote given for the sitting member was false. What declaration of the officers, therefore, which is material to the election, was true? Absolutely none. The whole return therefore must be rejected for every purpose of evidence as to the result of the election.

If the sitting member wishes this precinct counted for him he must show the vote by other testimony. This he has not done. He relies upon the admissions of the impeached officers, made on cross-examination, to show what the true vote was. But can the statements of men as witnesses be received when their certificates as officers as to the subject-matter are rejected as false? The same conduct which impeaches their official acts will also impeach their unofficial declarations.

But the statements of the officers themselves do not help the sitting member. Hahn, the clerk, testifies that he knew nothing of the vote except as he learned it from the judges. Kelley, the Democratic judge, stated that the result was so mixed up the judges could not tell which way it was. Jahn, a Republican judge, said that the return before the additions were made did not show the true result, and that none of the judges or clerks could tell what the true vote was.

Is there anything in this testimony, supposing it stood alone, to show the result in that precinct? Absolutely nothing. Yet this is all the evidence there is upon this point. No recount of ballots, no voter in the precinct called to testify as to his vote, no person put upon the stand, who knew the result, to state what it was.

Mr. Speaker, if ever there was a case of uncertainty resulting from the misconduct of election officers, it seems to me it is here. What more conclusive evidence of uncertainty than the statements of the officers themselves? If they say they did not ascertain the result and could not, who shall ascertain it for them? If the officers the night of election had signed a certificate stating that through their own violations of the law they could not ascertain the result, they would have told the truth. The contestee has given you no more evidence than they had. What, therefore, it was impossible for them then to do it is impossible for you to do now. This precinct must be rejected because its true vote never has been, and with the evidence before you never can be, ascertained or declared.

For another reason this entire poll should be thrown out. When these ballots were put upon the table and "what was left of them" was returned to the ballot-box, a preliminary count had shown there were 7 more tickets than there were names on the poll-books as they appeared. After the final count they were 5 tickets short. Therefore between the close of the election and the close of the count 12 tickets had disappeared. Not only was there an opportunity through exposure of the ballots in violation of law to tamper with them, but there was an actual tampering with them.

Remember what the judge of the election stated as to the disposition made of the tickets which had been unlawfully exposed on the table. The tickets were returned to the ballot-box preparatory to the final count. But what tickets? Not the tickets taken from the box—not the tickets which had been deposited by the voters, but "what was left of them."

Some of them had disappeared. How many? Who had caused their disappearance? What was the motive for destroying them? We have shown that twelve, at least, had disappeared, and how many more, who can tell?

It was said in the argument of this case before the Committee on Elections that the contestant ought to be satisfied if 12 votes were taken from the returned majority of contestee in this precinct. That proposition rests upon a misapprehension utterly of the law.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no verity in an election unless there is certainty that the votes counted are those cast; unless the ballots actually deposited by the voters are counted. The counting of other votes does not ascertain the result. There must be absolute assurance that the ballots are actually expressive of the sense of those who cast them. This can only be had when the tickets have remained in the places and in the custody of the officers appointed by law. To permit them to be handled by others than officers, to expose them in places where by law they are not permitted to be, is to invite improper interference from dishonest men. Large proportions of election frauds have been perpetrated through these opportunities, and legislation has always imposed the severest penalties upon those who engage in them. The interest of pure elections demands that no exposed vote shall ever be counted unless it is clearly shown that no harm has been done through the exposure. If tampering has actually occurred, then the return should be rejected without hesitation. Popular government requires it, for unless the choice of the people can be honestly ascertained elections are worse than a mockery. To allow such practices at the source is as though a corpse were thrown into a fountain, from which all the outflowings afterward would savor of death.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another ground for the rejection of this precinct. It is that these corrupt practices prevailed. It was a precinct which at the previous general election had given 70 Democratic majority. A stranger by the name of Gerstmann, a man of whom I had never heard until long after the election, visited the city of Toledo in relation to election matters, under the direction of the Republican national committee. He went to this precinct after he had reported to Mr. Brown, the chairman of the local Republican committee of Toledo, for service. Mr. Brown detailed him to this particular precinct to ascertain the sentiment of the community, chiefly because he spoke the language of its inhabitants, who were Germans and Poles. His work was supervised by Brown until it was finished. Under his direction Gerstmann went to the city of New York to report to the Republican national committee what he had ascertained.

This man Gerstmann went from house to house and from saloon to saloon throughout that district finding out the sentiment of the voters. He testifies that he found it all for me. It had been a Democratic precinct, and he wanted to know of some of the leaders there whether a change in the sentiment could be brought about. The answer was, "Yes, by the expenditure of two or three thousand dollars in money." When he returned to New York he carried that information with him and reported it to the Republican national committee.

Mr. Elkins said it was important that Mr. Hurd should be beaten; that his election involved a nationally important question; that he was a free-trader, and should be defeated on that account, and directed Gerstmann to go back to Toledo and instruct the Republican committee to do all that they could to defeat him. He said, "I will not give you the money, but it will be supplied, it will go there as soon as it will be necessary through the proper channels for the purposes for which you desire it." Gerstmann returned to Toledo a few days before the election, and went over the very same ground and talked with the very same people, with the voters there with whom he had conversed before, and learned that the sentiment had changed; from the admissions of the voters themselves he learned that the change had been made by the use of money among them, and which change he testifies had been accomplished in the time between his first and last visit. This testimony of Gerstmann is corroborated by the statement of another witness, Jahn, who testified that the Republican manager in that precinct boasted a few days after the election that he had paid nineteen men from $3 to $10 apiece for services as ticket peddlers on election day.

If these facts are true, is there any question as to what ought to be done with this precinct? If an actual conspiracy were entered into in this little precinct in the city of Toledo, with its 450 votes, to defeat me, a conspiracy between the Republican national and the local committees; if money were expended for the purpose of corrupting the voters of that district, and a precinct with 70 Democratic majority was changed to 220 Republican thereby; if, as the testimony shows, a large amount of money had been expended in the ward for services which were not required, what must be the result of a question as to the count in that district? There can be no doubt that the whole vote should be excluded from the general return. But the majority of the committee say, in the first place, that Gerstmann, who testifies on this point, is not to be believed; that he is not a credible witness; that his testimony is incompetent or hearsay, and, even if admitted, that it does not disclose the names of the bribers or the bribed. The claim that he is not a credible witness is based upon the ground that in his cross-examination he declined to answer certain quesions.

But, Mr. Speaker, an examination of that testimony will show that the questions were so irrelevant and offensive that the witness felt insulted, and was justified in declining to answer.

Besides, all the cross-examination on which they rely to affect his credit relates to immaterial matters. It is not followed by an attempt at contradiction, nor is there anything in the testimony which affects his story as to the substantial matters. As to these, I will not ask this House to believe a word he has said if it be not fully corroborated by other facts which have been proven.

Let me show you the corroboration. What are the material facts? First, that there was a conspiracy between the national committee and the local committee in Toledo to corrupt Precinct B, ward 8, against me; second, that Gerstmann was the agent of the Republican party to inaugurate the scheme of corruption; and, third, that the money did actually go there to produce the dishonest result. As to all these he is fully corroborated. As to some of the matters to which he testifies, Mr. Warnke, a resident of the precinct, is put on the stand by contestee for purposes of contradiction. While denying certain statements of Gerstmann to which his attention was especially called in the interest of the contestee, he admits that Mr. Gerstmann came to his saloon and engaged in conversation with him about matters connected with the election at the very time that Mr. Gerstmann says he was there.

Here is a corroboration by their own witness of the important statement of Gerstmann that he was in Toledo at that precinct engaged in the work of the canvass.

Secondly, as to the important matter of a conspiracy, Mr. James M. Brown, of the city of Toledo, was chairman of the Lucas County, or perhaps of the city, committee managing the Republican campaign. Gerstmann testified it was to him he reported; that it was under his direction he visited this precinct and engaged in the work of ascertaining the feeling of the voters to lay the foundation for bringing the money there. This same James M. Brown was the attorney of Mr. Romeis, the sitting member, and was the very attorney engaged in the cross-examination of Gerstmann.

Now turn to Mr. Gerstmann's cross-examination. Does Brown ask him a question about what Gerstmann had said as to his interviews with him? Does he propound a question to him about the arrangement made between them in reference to that precinct about which Gerstmann had testified, or as to what was done in New York about carrying out the arrangement? Not one word.

Mr. Speaker, is it inconceivable that an attorney engaged in the cross-examination of a witness will sit quietly by and allow the witness to charge him with conspiracy and fraud and crime and not allude to it in the cross-examination if it be not that the witness is telling the truth? Brown could have gone on the stand himself to contradict him. But never did he testify. Never did he call the attention of Gerstmann to any one of the facts relative to the conspiracy to which he had testified.

It is a well established rule of law that when a man is present when a charge of crime is made against him and he is silent, the charge will be presumed to be true. And here, in this case, when Gerstmann charged there was a conspiracy to defraud me of my election, to debauch this precinct in the city of Toledo, in the presence of Mr. Brown, one of the alleged conspirators, and Brown does not deny it, he, by his silence, confesses it. And I ask no better corroboration of that important feature of the case than this silence of the attorney of the sitting member.

But there is a corroboration as to the other fact that money was sent to this precinct. Where did the Republican manager of the precinct get the money with which he paid the voters of that precinct, as he boasted he had done after the election?

It is not likely he paid it out of his own pocket. It is certainly a fair presumption that it came from a corruption fund which had been provided for that precinct.

I regretted to hear my friend from Pennsylvania say yesterday this was legitimate work, the paying of men for ticket-peddling. Why give one man $3 and another man $10? Why give nineteen men money for peddling tickets at an election in a little precinct containing less than 450 votes? If the same expenditure were made in the other precincts of the tenth Congressional district one thousand men would have been employed and from five to ten thousand dollars in money required. No such amount of money could ever be honestly used at an election.

It is said this testimony is hearsay. I deny it. It is the statement by the witness of a fact within his knowledge. The general sentiment of a community upon a particular subject is just as much a fact as anything else. And if you can not prove it by a man who declares he knows the fact, then you will be obliged to put every man in the community on the stand and show what his particular opinion was, so as to reach the general sentiment by the aggregate of individual opinions—a course which would be both impracticable and absurd.

But if there were any doubt upon this point that doubt is removed by a recent decision in an English contested-election case, the North Durham case. It is reported in 1 O'Malley and Hardcastle, page 152.

The petition contained the usual allegations of corrupt practices by agent, and also an allegation that the election was void on account of general riot and intimidation.

In the course of the case a witness who had been employed to canvass against the respondent was asked by Mr. A. L. Smith, for the petitioner:

Q. When you canvassed the tradesmen what was the feeling you found among them?

A. I found a reluctance to promise, and certain of them told me if they voted—

Mr. Sergeant Parry, for the respondent, objected to this as not being admissible. He submitted that the tradesmen themselves must be asked if it was sought to prove that they had been unduly influenced.

Mr. Baron Bramwell said:

I think you are at liberty to ask the question as to generals, but you may not ask as to particulars. You may ask the general question whether he found any particular difficulty in getting promises in a particular district, and if so whether he can attribue it to any cause.

The principle here established shows Gerstmann's testimony to be clearly competent.

But it is said the evidence does not disclose the names of the briber and the bribed. I did not intend to prove the briber and the bribed. If I had done that, I should have failed in the object I had in view.

I assail the whole precinct, endeavoring to show that it should be thrown out on account of general corruption. If I had proved the briber and the bribed, the poll could have been purged by the elimination of the illegal votes. The entire poll will never be rejected when you know the bribed votes. This will be done only where general bribery has been shown, and it is impossible to separate the good votes from the bad. It is like proving the general reputation of an individual to be bad.

It can not be shown by particular acts of misconduct, by proving what people generally say of the person assailed. It is that sort of impeachment that I have attempted to make of this precinct in this case. I claim that the testimony is competent to show it; that in all the material points the corroboration of Gerstmann is complete, and that if it were not, the failure of the sitting member to put a single witness on the stand to contradict any of the suspicions that have been proved makes out a case.

It is said that the proof I have given as to the declarations of the manager of the election in this precinct is not competent because it is also hearsay. It will be remembered that one of the witnesses testified that the Republican manager told him shortly after the election that he had paid nineteen men from three to ten dollars apiece for services as ticket peddlers the evening after the election. I admit that these declarations would not be competent to affect the sitting member with bribery, nor even to prove that nineteen persons had been bribed. But I claim that they are competent as the admissions of a confessed agent made shortly after the election as a circumstance tending to show the prevalence of corrupt practices on election day. Such evidence has been repeatedly admitted in recent English contested-election cases.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that for all these reasons the whole vote of this precinct ought to be rejected. It ought not to be counted because of the uncertainty of the result, because of the misconduct of the election officers, because of the tampering with the ballot-box, because of general bribery and corruption. If all this be not enough to affect a precinct, and to show that it ought to be thrown out, I do not know what testimony would be regarded as sufficient. Six out of the eight Democratic members of the committee who express an opinion upon it agree that it should be rejected, and I do not know upon what principle any other conclusion can be reached.

Mr. Speaker, the poll must go. The sanctity of the ballot-box has been invaded and no atonement can be made for it; the certificate has been stained, and no waters can purify it; the ballots have been poisoned and nothing can cleanse them, and the return itself is a lie, and neither this House nor any other power can make it true.

Kelley's Island is the next precinct to which I call attention. That is a little island in Lake Erie. It gave 55 Democratic majority in 1883, and 29 Republican majority against me in 1884. Mr. Norman Kelley was the leading man in the precinct. He employed seventy men, nearly one-third of the voters. The proof shows that he said to the men that if Frank Hurd were elected and free-trade were to prevail he would be compelled to reduce his force two-thirds, and that when the time for reduction came the first to go would be those who voted for me and against his interests and their own.

Not satisfied with that, he ordered his men to vote between 5 and 6 o'clock in the afternoon; he went down to the door of the hall where the election was held, and as the men passed in he required them to show their tickets to him; in two instances he went to the poll with men to see that they put in the tickets he had given them, and when one man dared to vote the Democratic ticket he said to him, in the presence of a crowd of his employés, "You shall be the very first to go." The Democrats protested against this interference, and begged him to let his men vote according to their own judgment, but he replied: "It is a matter of business with me, and I am going to protect my business." As I understand it, there is no dispute as to the facts. This is a clear case of intimidation, and certainly a clear violation of the Ohio statute, which expressly prohibits the employer from directly or indirectly interfering with or compelling his men to vote against their inclinations.

But it is maintained that the vote of the precinct shall not be affected, because there is no proof to show that the intimidation was effectual or that it produced the result of compelling the man to vote for Mr. Romeis. This implies that the burden of proof is upon me, not merely to prove the intimidation, but in addition to prove that the intimidation accomplished its purpose. Mr. Speaker, I do not so understand the law. Intimidation, when practiced, is a crime, and when proved on the part of a contestant, because it is a crime, devolves upon the contestee the duty of explaining what its results have been. It is sufficient for the contestant to show the violation of law.

When that is shown, when the organization of the intimidation has been proven, the presumption is that it would not have been practiced if it had not been necessary and that its natural results have followed in the way of influencing the election. And then, as all lawyers know, by the operation of that doctrine which in the progress of the trial of a cause shifts the burden of proof through presumptions, the burden is shifted from the contestant to the contestee. There are three presumptions, Mr. Speaker, which shift this burden from the contestant to contestee. One is that the natural consequences of an unlawful act have followed; and if a man in whose interest such unlawful act is done does not show that the natural consequences did not follow, the presumption will be that they have followed. The second is, that where a fact is proven in the case which is material, and the other party has such control over the witnesses as would enable him better to put them on the stand and produce the testimony, then if he does not do it the presumptions are that the suspicious circumstances which they might have explained if they testified are true.

In this case these employés were in the service of Mr. Kelley; and it was easier for him to put them on the stand than it was for the contestant. The third presumption is that all things are presumed against the unlawful doer. Omnia præsumuntur contra spoliatorem. He who despoils, who violates the law, shall have every presumption against him. Here I have proved a violation of law in the interest of contestee. All the presumptions therefore are against him, and he must prove that the intimidation did not result in its natural consequences or lose the votes which were sought to be influenced.

Mr. Speaker, this rule is laid down in the English cases. I will read only two extracts. In Cunningham on Elections, page 184, it is said:

> Another very important proposition of election law is established by the case, namely, that when the law has been violated and outraged, and intimidation organized, the onus is on the respondent of showing that that intimidation and violence have not produced their natural consequence.

I make one further citation. It is from the opinion of Mr. Baron Bramwell in the election case from the county of North Durham, already referred to:

> What the judge has to do in that case—that is, where intimidation is proved—is to say that the burden of proof is cast upon the constituency whose conduct is incriminated, and unless it can be shown that the gross amount of intimidation could not possibly have affected the result of the election, it ought to be declared void. * * * Besides, I am of the opinion that where there has been so large an amount of intimidation that it is uncertain whether the result would have been the same without it, it can not be said that the election was free, or that it represented the real opinion of the constituency, but that it must be held void on account of that intimidation.

This very doctrine was also declared by this House in the case of Goode vs. Platt. I wish members would read the speech made in that case by Hon. J. Randolph Tucker in defense of the proposition as I now maintain it; and it was his purpose to make the same statement to-day; but I understand he has been called away, so that he will not have the opportunity of saying to this House what he has said to me, that he heartily approves of the views I have expressed upon this point. The doctrine of the law maintained in that speech and sustained by the House in seating Mr. Goode was that after proof of intimidation the burden of proof is put upon the respondent, and unless he is able to show that the intimidation did not affect the result the election in the precinct where intimidation was practiced should be declared void. There can be no doubt that the rule laid down by these authorities is correct.

Intimidation is an exterior power that operates upon the mind, and no man can know its influence and extent except the person over whom it has been practiced. The proposition is therefore that I shall put the employés of Mr. Kelley on the stand, and show by them that intimidation affected their votes. But, sir, consider in the first place that these very men unless discharged would be under the same control in testifying that they were under when they voted. If they trembled before their employer when they cast their ballots, will they not fear him when they are called upon to testify against him and convict him of crime? It is a cruelty to compel weakness which has once yielded to coercion to be exposed to the temptation of perjury. It is an outrage to set a man's livelihood and that of his family against truth. But again, who is willing to admit that he has been intimidated? Who will willingly confess that he has been a coward?

Who will consent to say that his conduct, even under the most trying circumstances, has been controlled by the power of others? The respect which everybody has for the brave, courageous, determined man, and the contempt with which everybody regards the coward, attest the unwillingness with which witnesses will testify that they have been affected by intimidation. Do not adopt a rule which will compel men to go upon the stand and proclaim that they have been unmanly.

But, in the third place, who can measure intimidation? What is its height and depth, its length and breadth? Rarely does it operate alone upon the human mind. It is associated with other influences and powers; and then who shall testify what share it had in producing the result? Sometimes it is so hidden that you can scarcely trace it. Often it is so delicate or indeterminate that the man himself scarcely realizes that he has been influenced by it.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that if you put the burden of proof upon the contestant to show what intimidation has done, that it has affirmatively affected the result, you compel him to do an impossibility. There is no difficulty in the contestee showing that the intimidation did not affect the vote; and therefore under the rule of law I have already suggested the burden of proof must be upon him.

Mr. Speaker, there is something to me especially revolting in this kind of intimidation. How pitiful, how pathetic, the spectacle of the high-minded man who is struggling against its power! If he were alone he might make a struggle successfully, because with purpose unquailed and will uncontrolled he could seek employment in new fields. But if he have a wife and home involved, then how strong the temptation to yield. On the one side are political convictions, sense of duty, party associations, party fealty; on the other the home his earnings have saved, his faithful wife, and his clinging children. Intimidation did not affect the result!

Mr. Speaker, there is something particularly revolting in this kind of intimidation to a generous and humane nature. Remember that it is only a corrupt man who can be bribed, but an honest man may be intimidated. The crime is all on the part of the intimidator. The law is so kind to human weakness and frailty that it holds him guiltless who has been coerced by superior power. Where intimidation is attempted, I can conceive of no spectacle more touching and pathetic than the struggle of the high-minded man against the coercive power. If alone he might make it successfully, for the world is wide, and with noble purpose and unquailed will he can seek employment in new fields. But it may be that his family and home are involved. When they are, how strong is the inducement to yield! On the one side are manhood, political convictions, party associations, partisan fealty; on the other the humble home his earnings have saved, the faithful wife and clinging children. His home and their happiness set against a single ballot! If he could, he would deceive his employer by voting the ticket of his choice. But the employer is on watch at the polls. His ticket is placed in his hands. It is voted.

The struggle is over. His manhood is gone. His self-respect is gone, his political convictions surrendered, his party ties sundered; but his home is safe, his wife shall not suffer, his children shall not starve.

Shame upon a cause which in its interest will perpetrate such crimes against labor. [Applause.] Shame upon a party that shall deliberately engage in the work of unmanning men. [Applause.]

This gentleman, Norman Kelley, said he was interfering with his men in the interest of his business to protect his business. I do not know of any business, Mr. Speaker, that requires violation of law for its protection. If there be, the quicker men engaged in it get out of it the better.

You may have enterprises that bloom into seeming prosperity; you may have your lines of trade cast in every direction; you may gather your wealth from every nation; but if your business must succeed through crime and violence the day will come when enterprise will fail and when the trade will be lost and the wealth shall not remain. [Applause.]

I want Mr. Kelley and every other employer in America like him to understand this: You may own your acres, you may own your plants, you may own your machine and your machinery, but you can not own your men. [Applause.] With your employés there is a line over which you shall not go. [Renewed applause.] You may persuade, you may argue, you may convince, if you will, but you shall not threaten, you shall not coerce, you shall not compel. That is the lesson which the law teaches. That is the lesson I would have this House to-day teach. Teach every employer in America that every vote attempted to be intimidated shall be lost to the person for whom it is attempted to be compelled unless such person shall affirmatively show that the intimidation did not affect it.

Teach them that they must respect the rights of labor and the dignity of manhood. Teach them that no wealth however great can rob the humblest citizen of his suffrage, and that no manufacturing interest however potential shall be permitted to interfere with the freedom of elections. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, if these two precincts are thrown out I shall be elected. Exclude the precinct in the eighth ward, and count this in Kelley's Island as returned, and you have given to one man on that island the power to elect a member of this House.

Reject it, as I propose, exclude it from the general return, and then the true majority of the honest, uncorrupted, and unintimidated precincts is for me.

Mr. Speaker, I do not deem it improper in conclusion to call attention to the election at which I was defeated. It was the October election in Ohio in 1884. The Democratic party of that State was engaged in the first great battle of a national contest. The efforts were concentrated upon its soil. The fate of the Republican party was held in its hands. If Ohio went against the Republican State ticket, then Ohio was lost to the Republican candidate for the Presidency. It is a matter of public notoriety that whatever wealth and power and organization could do to secure success for that party was done. Members of the different Departments at Washington here were in Ohio then. The campaign was managed under the eye of the great leader of the Republican party himself. The Republican candidate for President was in Ohio, and in my own district staid on the night before the election.

The eyes of the whole nation were turned to it. The whole country awaited the result with the keenest anxiety. The battle everywhere else was suspended, but it went on in the State of Ohio. And how it went on on the part of the Democracy, with its strain on nerve and vitality against fearful odds, especially in the larger cities, none know except the gallant Democrats of Ohio themselves who were engaged in the conflict. We were defeated; but, Mr. Speaker, who shall say that the day lost then was not the day won in November? It was in this battle, in the very forefront of it, in which I was stricken down. If I had been fairly stricken down I should have waited for the tender hand of a kindlier day to lift me up; but having been unfairly overcome, as I honestly believe, could I do less than to appeal to this House to give me the seat to which I am entitled, not through sympathy, not through partisanship—God forbid—but in punishment of wrong and in vindication of right? [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to modify the motion which I offered on yesterday, so as to make the first resolution offered by the minority a substitute for the first resolution of the commiteee, and the second a substitute for the second resolution of the committee, so that the vote can come up regularly.

Mr. TURNER addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 2239) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War.

CONTESTED ELECTION—HURD VS. ROMEIS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON] to substitute the first resolution proposed by the minority for the first resolution proposed by the majority. The Clerk will read the first resolution proposed by the majority.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Frank H. Hurd was not elected a member of the Forty-ninth Congress, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER. For that the gentleman from Kentucky proposes a substitute, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Jacob Romeis was not elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I think we may as well have the yeas and nays.

Mr. TURNER. I desire to state that the other section of the minority had proposed a resolution, which I am entirely willing should be offered now as a substitute for those pending.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the resolution referred to by the gentleman from Georgia is the same resolution as is proposed by the first branch of the resolution of the minority, namely, that the sitting member is not entitled to his seat, the first vote comes upon that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution upon which we are going to vote be again read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will cause the resolution to be again read. The Clerk will read first the resolution proposed by the majority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Frank H. Hurd was not elected a member of the Forty-ninth Congress, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER. For the resolution just read the minority of the committee propose a substitute, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Jacob Romeis was not elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the substitute which has just been read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 168, not voting 50; as follows:

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. NELSON.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, with Mr. RICE.

Mr. WINANS with Mr. BUCK.

Mr. HUDD with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. PIRCE.

Mr. SADLER with Mr. BURLEIGH.

For this day:

Mr. DIBBLE with Mr. MILLIKEN.

Mr. DANIEL with Mr. SESSIONS.

On the Hurd-Romeis case:

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. STORM.

Mr. ELDREDGE with Mr. COOPER. Mr. ELDREDGE would vote for Hurd, and Mr. COOPER for Romeis.

Mr. TUCKER with Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin.

Mr. ARNOT with Mr. FARQUHAR.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. MILLARD. Mr. RIGGS would vote for Hurd, and Mr. MILLARD for Romeis.

Mr. DARGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that I am paired with Mr. PIRCE, of Rhode Island, but I have voted upon the assumption that if he were present he would vote as I do upon this question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am announced as paired with Mr. ARNOT. Were he present, he would vote to seat Mr. Hurd and I would vote against it.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the second resolution and the proposed substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Jacob Romeis was elected a member of the Forty-ninth Congress and is entitled to retain his seat.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed substitute for the resolution just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Frank H. Hurd was elected a member of the Forty-ninth Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

The question was taken on agreeing to the substitute, and it was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the adoption of the resolutions reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If no division is asked, a vote will be taken upon both resolutions jointly.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were agreed to. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TURNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7632) to establish a light-ship off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My object is to call up the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that the general appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department has precedence on the Calendar, and that I will not consent to its being laid aside to take up the river and harbor bill as proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, pending this question, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] desires leave to print some remarks in the RECORD on the case of Hurd vs. Romeis.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The motion of Mr. WILLIS was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Clerk will report the first appropriation bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5886) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to passing over the bill the title of which has just been read? The Chair hears none. The title of the next bill in order will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6392) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIS. I make the same request in regard to this bill. I will state that I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. BELMONT], and he is ready, as he has been for the last ten days, to proceed with this bill; but in view of the necessity of having the river and harbor bill at the other end of the Capitol as speedily as possible he waives any contest for priority, upon the understanding that if the river and harbor bill should occupy more than four or five days we shall yield two hours for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the title of the next bill in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6395) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

The Clerk read as follows the title of the next bill in order:

A bill (H. R. 7481) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that this bill be passed over.

Mr. HATCH. I object. I insist upon its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the Committee of the Whole will rise and report the objection to the House.

The Committee of the Whole accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having reached in regular order the agricultural appropriation bill, objection was made to the motion to pass it over.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be instructed to pass over the agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the Committee of the Whole be instructed to pass the bill over?

The question was determined in the negative; there being—ayes 74, noes 89.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having refused to instruct the Committee of the Whole to pass over House bill No. 7481, the first reading of the bill is now in order.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to occupy a single moment in any general discussion of this bill. I only ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be now read by paragraphs for consideration under the five-minute rule. I will endeavor to answer any questions which may be asked in regard to the several paragraphs as they are reached.

There being no objection, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with; and the Committee of the Whole proceeded to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Animal Industry:
For carrying out the provisions of the act of May 29, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, there is hereby reappropriated the unexpended balance of the sum appropriated under section 10 of said act of May 29, 1884; also the unexpended balance of the sum appropriated under the paragraph "investigating the diseases of animals," in the act of June 5, 1884, making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and also the unexpended balance of the sum appropriated under the paragraph "Bureau of Animal Industry," in the act of March 3, 1885, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes."

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to state the amount of the unexpended balances referred to in this paragraph.

Mr. HATCH. The fiscal statement up to February 1 of this year showed that this Bureau had in round numbers—I have forgotten the exact figures—$150,000, which the committee considered sufficient for the wants of the bureau as now established by law. There is now upon the Calendar a bill from our committee proposing to amend the existing law. If that bill should be passed, it will increase or diminish the appropriation recommended, according to the form in which it may become a law.

Mr. DUNHAM. Is not $150,000 a great deal more than is really needed?

Mr. HATCH. The committee thought not. It is about what they consider right for the next fiscal year.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I understand that this paragraph appropriates in round numbers $150,000.

Mr. HATCH. It does not appropriate it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. It reappropriates it.

Mr. HATCH. We are advised that, according to the opinion of the accounting officers of the Treasury, it is really unnecessary to put this clause in the bill; but the committee were unanimous in favor of including it, so that the House might know the amount to the credit of the department; and the reappropriation will avoid the possibility of any question arising in the future as to the power to expend this money.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HATCH. There is one amendment which the committee desire to offer to remedy an accidental omission. I ask unanimous consent to amend by inserting after the word "dollars," in line 33, page 2, the words "one assistant fireman, at $500," and to increase in accordance with this addition the aggregate appropriation made by the paragraph.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCREARY. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what is the whole amount it appropriates? It is not stated in the bill; and I have not been able to get a copy of the report.

Mr. HATCH. The amount appropriated by the bill, as stated in the report, is $523,215.

Mr. McCREARY. That is less than was appropriated last year?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, before being laid aside I desire to submit an amendment to the last section of the bill, which I will have read. I will state that it was considered by the Committee on Agriculture and received the commendation of the committee, and though it is not in the bill, it is embodied in the report. I think, however, it ought to be in the bill, and hence I offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of the second section:
"Provided, That the salaries and compensation herein provided for shall be for full service during the legal hours of labor of each secular day in the year, and any less service shall be entitled to a proportionately less compensation."

Mr. HATCH. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, and I think the gentleman from Wisconsin will remember that that resolution was adopted by the committee and has been inserted to accompany the report, but is not a part of the bill.

Mr. PRICE. In reply to the gentleman from Missouri I will state that the subject——

Mr. HATCH. I will reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. It was considered by the committee, who regarded it of sufficient importance to embody it in the report. I offered the amendment in the committee and was overruled there, but I distinctly reserved the right to present it here for the action of the House.

We found, Mr. Chairman, upon an examination of the facts, that there were persons employed there who never pretended to work over six hours a day, and on Saturdays only five and a half hours; we found seventy persons at work during the year, when the law prescribed that only twenty-seven should be employed; and that they, by a zealous expenditure of the time, were able to make an appearance of earning the money. Now I wanted to guard against the possibility of the continuance of that proceeding. I am perfectly willing to give a million of dollars if it be necessary for this work; but I do not want it to be paid out to political pets who do not earn their money. That is the reason I have offered the amendment. If the House is in accord with the sentiment they will sustain the amendment; if not, they can vote it down.

Mr. HATCH. In behalf of the Committee on Agriculture I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and that is, we have called the attention of the Commissioner of Agriculture, in the report of the committee and by this resolution, to the existing law, and all that is required is that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall execute the law as it is upon the statute-book.

Mr. PRICE. And I want to make it compulsory upon the Commissioner of Agriculture to do so. I want to compel him to do that which neither he nor his predecessors have done.

Mr. HATCH. I must insist upon the point of order against the amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order, upon the ground alleged by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], and rules it out.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to make the point of order that the objection made by the gentleman from Missouri comes too late. The gentleman from Wisconsin had offered the amendment and was proceeding to discuss it. It was under consideration by the House.

Mr. HATCH. Not at all. The point of order was made at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the point of order to be reserved.

Mr. TAULBEE. I submit if it is not true that the gentleman from Wisconsin was proceeding to discuss the amendment when the gentleman from Missouri made his point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order was made in time, as it was distinctly reserved by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HATCH. I reserved it at the time.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to ask wherein the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin changes existing law? I understood the gentleman from Missouri to say that the law now provides that these employés in the Agricultural Department, seventy in number, should do certain work, and that seventy employés are only doing the work that twenty-seven should do, and the gentleman from Wisconsin says in effect by his amendment that we will direct the Commissioner to execute the law, and by executing it to discharge forty-three useless employés.

Mr. HATCH. It is all covered by the resolution of the committee. It is embodied in the report.

Mr. PRICE. Yes, in our report, which is binding upon no living man under heaven.

Mr. HATCH. We will see that it is after this fiscal year terminates.

Mr. CANNON. Upon that point, made by the gentleman from Missouri, that it does change existing law: It may be the present Commissioner of Agriculture may consider that the existing law, which requires twenty-seven persons to perform the work that he employs seventy persons to do, was passed under a Republican admistration, and that it does not bind this administration—the Democratic administration—at all. And if perchance by directing him, as the gentleman from Wisconsin says, to observe the existing law, you may possibly make him recognize that it is binding upon him.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I do not think the gentleman can speak to a point of order which has been already decided by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was indulging the gentleman for his own information. If an improper ruling has been made, the Chair is perfectly willing to indulge the gentleman to point it out.

Mr. CANNON. I should not have attempted to argue the question were it not that I gather from the gentleman from Missouri himself, as well as the gentleman from Wisconsin, both agreeing upon the one point, that there is a distinct violation of the law which they had sought to correct not by the action of Congress but by a mere reference in the report of the committee, which binds nobody.

Now, the minds of the two gentlemen meeting upon the proposition that there is this violation of law, it occurred to me there could be no contravention of the rule by instructing the Commissioner of Agriculture to execute the law by legislative enactment. That is all.

Mr. SKINNER. I want to make a remark or two at this juncture. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] said what he wanted to do was to keep political pets from being put in office and kept there for political purposes. I want to say that the Commissioner of Agriculture, if he keeps any political pets in that office, keeps Republican political pets. He has got there, as I understand now, one private secretary, paid $1,800; one disbursing clerk, paid $1,800; superintendent of the folding-room, paid $1,200; three messengers, each $720; one laborer in folding-room, $600; two laborers on grounds, each $660; four or five laborers on the grounds, each $400; one coachman, $660; two firemen, each $720; none of whom are protected by the civil-service act. I merely wanted to say that it was not Democratic pets the Commissioner was protecting, but Republican pets.

Mr. McCREARY. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] raised the point of order that it was in violation of the rules of this House, inasmuch as it proposed to enact new legislation. The Chair promptly decided, and I think decided correctly, that the point of order was well taken. Now, sir, as the Chair decided that way, I submit there is nothing to be done except to go on with the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The Chair will state again he listened to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] simply because he desired to hear him for his own information.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next general appropriation bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will not press that motion.

The motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 43, noes 71.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to ask what is the duty of the Chairman when in Committee of the Whole it is developed that a quorum is not present?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the motion in committee to rise is equivalent to a motion of adjournment in the House, and neither motion requires a quorum.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did not the vote show a quorum is not present?

The CHAIRMAN. The vote on a motion to rise does not show that. The Clerk will report the next general appropriation bill.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not intend at this late hour to occupy the time of the House. But this bill appropriating a large amount of money should be explained, and, with the promise of the committee, I will to-morrow undertake to explain it. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7481) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with an amendment; and further, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having also had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the previous question on the bill (H. R. 7481) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRICE. If the previous question is ordered will that exclude all amendment?

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of the previous question. It stops all debate and amendment.

Mr. PRICE. Then I hope the House will not order the previous question till the amendment I offered in committee has been voted on.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. PRICE. I rise to announce the fact that a quorum is not developed. I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has announced the result on the motion for ordering the previous question. The gentleman can call for a division on the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. The amendment is not pending.

The SPEAKER. An amendment is reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—PAGE VS. PIRCE.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Elections that it may be printed, intending to call it up on a future day.

The resolution accompanying the report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That WILLIAM A. PIRCE, sitting member from the second Congressional district of Rhode Island, be allowed thirty days from the passage of this resolution within which to resubpœna and cross-examine witnesses heretofore examined by Charles H. Page, the contestant, and to take any testimony he may desire, and that ten days thereafter be allowed to said Page to take evidence in rebuttal.

The resolution and accompanying report were ordered to be printed and laid over.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

Mr. COCKRELL presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Carthage, Mo., and a memorial of Knights of Labor of Jackson, Johnson, and La Fayette Counties, in the State of Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Atlantic, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Ionia and Mount Clemens, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER. I rise to present a memorial from the Saratoga Monument Association.

It will be remembered that Congress has made one or two appropriations to aid in the erection of a monument upon the battlefield of Saratoga. Moneys were also appropriated by the State of New York, and a very large sum, I think $100,000 or more, has been collected by private subscriptions. At all events the money thus collected and donated by the State of New York and by the Congress of the United States has been sufficient to finally complete this monument. It is one of the finest monuments in the United States to-day. The board of trustees of the association, who have had this matter in hand and have carried it to completion desire to have a public dedication of the monument some time during the present year. The funds of the monument association have been entirely consumed in the erection and completion of this great work, and they ask that a suitable appropriation may be made by Congress to aid in properly celebrating and dedicating the completion of the monument.

I ask that this memorial be read, as it is short, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library; and I hope that the committee will be able to take speedy action in the matter.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be read and referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

Memorial.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The Saratoga monument, which in ornate and enduring granite records the most important event of our Revolutionary annals, is now completed, and what in these days may be considered phenomenal, completed at the original estimated cost. No debt hangs over it. The Saratoga Monument Association, under whose supervision the structure has been erected, now wish to have the monument dedicated the coming autumn, by which time the bronzes for its interior and exterior adornment are expected to be in place—dedicated in a manner worthy of the great event which it commemorates.

The association propose to invite to be present on that occasion the President of the United States and his Cabinet, the foreign ministers accredited to this country, and also delegations from the different States of the Union.

It is also proposed to extend to the French Government a special invitation to send a representative delegation, since it was the surrender of Burgoyne which brought about the French alliance, and thus enabled the contest finally to be decided in favor of the Colonies.

But the Saratoga Monument Association, having exhausted all the available means at their disposal, find themselves entirely powerless to make the dedication worthy of a great nation. Accordingly, and bearing in mind the generous spirit which instigated Congress to appropriate $100,000 for the celebration of the surrender at Yorktown, which event would have been rendered impossible but for the surrender at Saratoga, the association respectfully ask from your honorable body an appropriation adequate to insure the success of the proposed dedication. The association, although believing that $20,000 would not be too much to ask for, yet willingly leave Congress to determine the sum which it thinks should be sufficient for the purpose indicated, praying that action be taken as soon as possible in order that the committee having the work in charge may know what can be depended upon, and make arrangements accordingly.

All of which is most respectfully submitted.

Mr. VEST presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Carthage, Lamar, Rich Hill, Trenton, Stanberry, Lexington, Randolph, Festus, Warrensburg, Bevier, and Calhoun, in the State of Missouri, and a memorial of Knights of Labor of Jackson, Johnson, and La Fayette Counties, in the State of Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of citizens of Saint Louis and Oregon, in the State of Missouri, praying legislation to so amend the Constitution of the United States as to protect women in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Saint Louis, Clinton, Huntsville, and Springfield, in the State of Missouri, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement and especially the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Short-Horn Breeders' Association of Saline County, Missouri, praying legislation for the suppression and control of contagious diseases of cattle, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Rockport, Mass., praying the construction of a harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, Rockport, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Saint Louis and Kansas City, in the State of Missouri, praying for the restoration of the wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Saint Louis, Mo., remonstrating against certain proposed legislation on the subject of pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of W. Smith Hedges and others, citizens of Barton County, Missouri, praying for the free coinage of silver and for the speedy payment of the national debt; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of wage-workers of the United States, praying for the unlimited coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, praying for liberal appropriations to subsidize any steamship line establishing steam communication between the Mississippi Valley and the Central and South American states through the port of New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor, Local Assembly No. 107, of Missouri, praying for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a petition of the Clearing-House Association of Kansas City, Mo., praying for legislation giving jurisdiction to the United States courts in civil cases in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the wholesale merchants of the city of Saint Louis, Mo., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1025 giving jurisdiction to the United States courts in civil cases in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 380) for the relief of Mrs. Henrietta H. Cole, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 858) granting a pension to Lucy J. Mitchell;
A bill (H. R. 1292) granting a pension to Mrs. Kate Miller;
A bill (H. R. 3359) granting a pension to Henry S. Morgan;
A bill (H. R. 3399) to grant a pension to Philip Wagner;
A bill (H. R. 2939) granting a pension to Henry H. Green; and
A bill (H. R. 5234) granting a pension to Jesse H. Gaines.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 668) for the relief of Charles de Arnaud, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2145) for the relief of Rebecca Eldridge, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 862) granting a pension to Matilda Ann Wiley, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. N. C. Cushman, widow of the late Commander Charles H. Cushman, United States Navy, praying for an increase of pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2148) granting a pension to Mrs. Nannie Cushman; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4026) granting a pension to Algernon S. Flagg;
A bill (H. R. 4027) granting a pension to Sophia Y. Bixby;
A bill (S. 2025) granting a pension to James Butler;

A bill (H. R. 1369) granting a pension to George H. Perkins;
A bill (H. R. 1152) for the relief of Mrs. Ellen S. Tolman; and
A bill (H. R. 1113) granting a pension to Walter S. Haynes.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1937) authorizing the city of Salem to construct a bridge across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads an amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill providing an appropriation of $36,000 "for compensation due the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company for carrying the United States mails during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886," that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. In submitting the report I wish to state on behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads that it is not committed to the precise sum stated in the amendment; but the subject it is deemed proper to send to the Committee on Appropriations for its consideration.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, who shall be a stenographer, at an annual salary of $1,440; and that the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the said salary out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7481) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 7632) to establish a light-ship off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay; and

A bill (H. R. 2239) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 2149) granting an increase of pension to Herman Baumhager; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2150) in relation to cemeteries and churches or buildings used for religious worship located upon the public lands of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2151) to pension Bartola Thebaut, a soldier in the Florida Seminole Indian war of 1849–'50; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALTHALL introduced a bill (S. 2152) to amend chapter 218 of the acts of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, approved June 15, 1882; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2153) to create a board of audit to adjust all claims for special damages to real estate by reason of public improvements in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2154) granting a pension to George W. Menser; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM. I introduce a bill by request, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is not present, that it may be referred to the Committee on Claims. It was previously introduced, but in the body of a memorial, so that it was not discovered.

The bill (S. 2155) for the relief of John Wightman was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PREMISES FOR THIRD-CLASS POST-OFFICES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and hereby is, instructed to inquire and report to the Senate what legislation is necessary to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for the use of third-class post-offices.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NOTICES OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to give a notice. There are two matters on the Calendar which it seems to me common charity and common decency require that the Senate should dispose of, which will take but a very short time. One is the case of Alice C. Underwood, where a property in a claim which has been affirmed by two or three committees of the Senate in succession belongs to a young lady of great worth, known to several members of the Senate, and who is in very humble circumstances. The other is the case of Albert H. Emery, which has passed the Senate half a dozen times and failed to be disposed of in Congress.

I will not at this time interrupt the Senate, who desire to hear the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], I know, unanimously, by asking to take up either of these cases, but I give notice that at a very early day, when the time for the Calendar is reached, I shall ask the Senate to hear those matters and to dispose of them one way or the other.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the unanimous understanding of the Senate, the morning business being concluded, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] in regard to the consideration of executive nominations in open session, on which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire to discuss as fully as I can, without going over the ground which has already been occupied, the question so ably presented by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and also by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. I desire, however, to direct my remarks to the resolution offered by myself, which differs only in a very slight degree from the one offered by the Senator from Connecticut. In fact, there is very little choice between the two, but I prefer the one that I introduced, for the reason that it provides that the Senate shall be open without reference to a vote of the Senate in regard to the confirmation and rejection of persons whose names are sent to the Senate by the President of the United States. The resolution submitted by me is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the sessions of the Senate commonly known as executive sessions, so far as they apply to nominations, confirmations, or rejections, shall hereafter be held with open doors, and that a public record of the same shall be kept, the same as in legislative sessions.

At the end of the resolution I propose to add the following words:

And so much of section 2, Rule XXXVI, and section 2, Rule XXXVIII, of the standing rules of the Senate, as conflicts with or is inconsistent with the above is to the extent of such inconsistency rescinded.

Let me here state the rules that this applies to.

Rule XXXVI, sections 2 and 3, is as follows:

2. When acting upon confidential or executive business the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the Principal Legislative Clerk, the Executive Clerk, the Minute and Journal Clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper, and such other officers as the presiding officer shall think necessary; and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy.

3. All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy.

Rule XXXVIII, section 2, is as follows:

2. All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret. If, however, charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may, in its discretion, notify such nominee thereof, but the name of the person making such charges shall not be disclosed. The fact that a nomination has been made, or that it has been confirmed or rejected, shall not be regarded as a secret.

Rule XXXVI, section 4, provides:

4. Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret or confidential business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and to punishment for contempt.

The first Congress was to meet March 4, 1789; the House of Representatives did not organize until April 1, 1789. On the 6th of April, 1789, a quorum of the Senate being present, the votes for President and Vice-President were counted. On the 8th of April the House of Representatives threw open the doors of the House for the transaction of all business, and, except in rare instances, those doors have never been closed since.

The Senate meeting in April, 1789, in the following April, 1790, on the 29th of the month, a resolution for open legislative sessions was offered by James Monroe, who took his seat in February, 1791, and on the 24th of February, 1791, he renewed the motion that the legislative sessions of the Senate should be with open doors. That was defeated by a vote of 9 to 17.

March 26, 1792, the motion was again renewed by Monroe; it was then defeated by a vote of 8 to 17.

On the 4th of February, 1793, a resolution was offered as follows:

Resolved, That the conducting of the legislative and judicial powers of the Senate in public, and suffering an account of their measures and deliberations to be published in the newspapers, is the best means of diffusing general information concerning the principles, motives, and conduct of individual members; and that, by withholding this information, responsibility becomes unavailing, the influence of their constituents over one branch of the Legislature in a great measure annihilated, and the best security which experience has devised against the abuse of power and a maladministration abandoned.

It was negatived by yeas 7, nays 21.

On the same day a motion was made to agree to another resolution, in these words:

Resolved, therefore, That it be a standing rule that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open while the Senate shall be sitting in a legislative and judicative capacity, except on such occasions as, in their judgment, may require secrecy; and that this rule shall commence and be enforced on the first day of the next session of Congress.

That resolution got 10 votes in this body, and there were 18 against it.

I quote from Senator PLATT:

The first rule for requiring any secrecy in the matter of executive nominations was passed on the 3d of January, 1820. Up to the 3d of January, 1820, there was no intimation or suggestion in the rules of the Senate that secrecy was enjoined or expected so far as action on nominations was concerned.

Mr. President, without going further into the history of the secret sessions of the Senate of the United States, I desire to state this one simple proposition, that there is not now nor has there ever been any necessity for the consideration of nominations in secret sessions. Before proceeding with my remarks, I will read from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, page 580, what he says with regard to the particular clause of the Constitution upon which this proposition seems to rest, or at least is claimed to rest. Mr. Story quotes Article I, section 5, paragraph 3, of the Constitution, as follows:

Each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.

In discussing that paragraph of the Constitution, Mr. Story says:

The object of the whole clause is to insure publicity to the proceedings of the Legislature, and a correspondent responsibility of the members to their respective constituents. And it is founded in sound policy and deep political foresight. Intrigue and cabal are thus deprived of some of their main resources by plotting and devising measures in secrecy. The public mind is enlightened by an attentive examination of the public measure; patriotism, and integrity, and wisdom obtain their due reward; and votes are ascertained, not by vague conjecture, but by positive facts.

Why secret sessions were ever adopted I can not conceive, or what there is in the discussion of the character of an individual who may be nominated by the President of the United States for official position that should be kept secret from the people of this country is beyond my ken. What there is in connection with the public or private character of any individual who is to become an official, and responsible to the people for his conduct in his official capacity, that should be covered over by a veil is something that I can not understand. If the reputation of a man for honesty and ability to perform the duties of an office can not be examined in the open day, I would like some one to inform me whether such a man is a proper man to hold official position.

This resolution applies alone to nominations and confirmations. It was said in substance by the Senator from South Carolina that perhaps in the early days of the Republic a fear existed in the minds of those who represented the people, they being somewhat timid in the management of the affairs of a great republic—the question may have arisen in their minds as to whether or not the people at that time had full knowledge and understanding of the principles upon which their government was based. I differ as to the intelligence of the people, however, even at that time.

But, sir, the House of Representatives, legislating with closed doors for a short period, soon opened their doors, and why? Because they were directly the representatives of the people; they receive the votes of the people and are responsible directly to their constituents, and they could not stand against the desire and right of the people to know what the character of legislation was and the course pursued by their Representatives who were elected by their votes; so, for that reason at once the doors of the House were opened; but the Senate, claiming at that time not to represent the people but to represent the States, ignoring the idea that they were the representatives of the people, but of the States, continued secret sessions, legislative and executive. But the people of this country are as much interested in having a knowledge of what their representatives in the Senate do, and what their course of conduct has been and now shall be in reference to confirmations as in regard to the legislative acts of their immediate representatives.

We are the representatives of the people as well as of the States. The people are represented in their State Legislatures, and by their will and consent and by no other authority do Senators hold their seats on this floor. That being true, we are as much indebted to the people, and as much bound to give to them at all times, not the necessary secrets of the nation, but to give to them a chance to look in upon and examine into our course of conduct in reference to our investigating men who are selected from their midst to perform the functions of office, as in reference to any legislative act.

Sir, in this discussion I do not want to see, and I hope we shall not see, Senators who are in favor of secret sessions silent. I do not wish to see silence reign in this Chamber while the desire exists with them to close the doors and fasten the gates against giving the knowledge to the people. If there are reasons for secret sessions let us have them, let the people know what they are. There is certainly not a Senator on this floor who is ashamed or afraid to allow what he says in secret sessions to go before the country. Would he say anything in secret session that he would not say before the world? Would he perform any act in secret session that he would not in open session? Can he be a man in open session and less than a man in secret session?

Why, sir, what do you discuss in secret in reference to confirmations that might not be discussed anywhere? If a man who is nominated for an office has been indicted and tried and convicted for crime, why should that be kept secret from the world? If he is an honest man he should be delighted to have it known by the country. If his reputation is good, he is willing to have it investigated. If his reputation is bad, he should not be nominated for office. Sir, let the doors of this Chamber be open when men's names come before the Senate, and confirmations through the mysterious agency of "Senatorial courtesy" will give place to the honest man whose fair record boldly courts public inspection.

Not only so, sir, but we shall find that open executive sessions for the consideration of nominations must aid in purifying the public service.

The traducer of character and the condoner of bad records will both shrink before the free and open consideration of executive nominations. Then, too, sir—I will not say such a thing has existed—a course that might be pursued by men calculated to deceive the honest and the ignorant who may apply for confirmation would cease if existing. The treacherous stiletto of cowardly opposition would give place to open and manly warfare. The applicant for public place with crooked record who expects to steal his way through the mysteries of secret session to an official position would seek other places than the halls of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, in a great republic like this, where we claim that all there is of this Government rests upon the consent of the people, if that be true why shall the people not know what we do in giving our consent, which means their consent, to the occupancy of official position? Secret sessions in many respects are demoralizing, not only to Senators but to those outside the Senate Chamber. Who is there in the Senate without manhood enough when a man comes to him and says, "I wish to be confirmed," if he is opposed to him will not tell him that he can not vote for him? Is there one? I hope not; but yet I have known men who believed they would be confirmed, and who claimed to have reason to believe so, that were rejected by large majorities. How did this occur? I will not undertake to explain. Still such things have occurred.

I said it was demoralizing. What do I mean by "demoralizing?" I mean that secret sessions encourage Senators, if they are so disposed, to utter what they would not desire to do perhaps in other places. I will not say they falsify, but some man might possibly obtain a seat in the Senate who would be guilty of that character of conduct. It may not have frequently occurred, but it may occur. Why is it? We have a rule in which we declare that we will expel any member from the Senate who gives away the secrets of the Senate. Are they not given away? Have you ever held an executive session where there were important matters considered that something was not given away that took place in the Senate? Who does it? We always say, of course not Senators. Who then? As was well said by the Senator from Connecticut, I acquit the officers of the Senate.

Now, if the secrets are given away, why not open the doors and let the world know the truth? If they are not given away they are pretended to be. The newspapers are full of them every day, and they profess to give them correctly. If they do not give them correctly and practice a deception upon the country, is it not better for the country to have the honest version of the action of the Senate given than to be deceived and have a false statement in reference to it? Yet the newspapers say they give it correctly. I will not say that they do or that they do not, except in certain instances I am sure that they have not; but they do the best they can. They get here and there what they can. They get the statements from some one, I do not know from whom, probably from the spittoons, or desks, or cats, if there are any about the Capitol; but nevertheless they get something.

Is it honest, is it right for the Senate to do that which induces falsehood to be sent to the country, if they say it is falsehood? Is that proper? If there is no harm to come from opening the doors of the Senate, is there not good to come from it? How? By the country having the truth instead of having that the truthfulness of which they suspect. Is it not encouraging the men who are engaged in newspaper work to state things that are not true; and in that respect is not the moral of it bad? The newspaper men must have something to send to their papers; they send what they can get; and are we not thereby encouraging them to scatter over the country that which is not true unless they should in some way get the absolute truth? Is it the part of honorable men to so act as to justify falsehood, and not only justify it but induce it, encourage it, and in fact force it, because it is forced and compelled by reason of the fact that if they do not give the facts they are expected to give something and something is given, so that the Senate to-day is responsible for every falsehood that is uttered in the newspapers in reference to executive sessions for confirmations. And why? Because they maintain that there is something mysterious, something that requires secrecy, in the confirmation or rejection of men whose names may be sent to the Senate—something mysterious about it, so as to make the people believe that great consequences might grow out of the fact that what Senators say or do here shall be known by the people. There are no great consequences to grow out of what may be said, no great consequences to grow out of what may be done, and my judgment is that if the doors were opened there would be less said than there is said in secret sessions; that our sessions would be not only more orderly, but debate would be of a more dignified and elevated character than possibly under existing circumstances.

Ah, sir, I believe, and I think we all do, in honest and in fair dealing with the people that we represent. I am not afraid of any of my official acts being exposed to the people. I may not do what my constituents desire always; I may fail in many respects in representing their wishes; I may fail to know what their wishes are; yet I am not afraid to have them see my votes, and I vote about as often as any Senator. I am perfectly willing they shall see my votes on confirmations, and if I dared do it I would tell every day what my vote was in every secret session; but I can not; this great and important secret must be locked up for all time in my breast.

I have spoken about the inducement to have the truth always go before the country and the people undeceived. Sir, truth is a jewel, though not possessed by all men; let us give encouragement to all men to adorn themselves with that jewel, by opening the doors and letting that truth that ought to go everywhere be sent out to the world, so that our course and our conduct may be open to inspection.

It was said centuries ago "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works." If we are to let our light so shine before men that they are to see our good works, we should not cover those acts in darkness; we should not throw over them the shade and darkness of night through which the light of truth can not penetrate; but, sir, we should let those acts be such that the light should flow from them, and our constituents determine whether they are good or whether they be bad.

But, Mr. President, let me state one other proposition. I intend to deal in general principles with reference to this question, as I do not wish to trespass upon the ground over which the Senator from Connecticut passed; but there is a great principle underlying this. There has never been a shackle that has fallen from men that has not been forced off either by the strong arm or by public opinion. Liberty comes by degrees, and not like a flood of light thrown instantly upon the world. It comes by constant pressure, it comes not from the source of kings or monarchs, but it comes from the class that requires to be released, who feel the oppressor's hand. It germinates there and grows until finally it bursts the bonds that confine it, and then those who have repressed it are apt to shout the loudest for it. Everything grows in reference to power, to peace, to government and all that there is connected with the affairs of man, except that particular system or policy which is believed in by a certain class that never yields, never grows, and never severs the bonds until by force of public opinion it is accomplished.

Look back for centuries; take governments instituted; where the power is or was in one head; his or her rule enforced upon the people, not through the people, enforced not by them but upon them. When the idea entered the minds of men that the modes, procedure, and laws and administration of government were too strong, too powerful, the people who were oppressed broke the bands and gave to themselves that measure of liberty which the times then demanded or would admit of.

So it is to-day, and so it is in all governments. Take the English Government to-day, where the queen sits enthroned with but little power. Much of that power once in the head of that government has been taken away step by step by that growth of liberty in the minds of the people, the knowledge which they have gained in reference to governmental affairs, and the intelligence they have acquired in regard to their own rights and the policy which is beneficial to them, until now that people have privileges unthought-of by them a century ago.

Take the case of Ireland to-day, downtrodden and trampled under foot for centuries. Why is it that the grandest statesman whom England has produced for half a century, perhaps, is to-day struggling in behalf of downtrodden Ireland? It is because of the growth of intelligence among the people; it is because of the expansion of the great idea of liberty; it is that light of intelligence breaking in upon the minds of the people, who are demanding certain privileges.

Ireland struggles for what? For a change, for more power to the people; in reference to government, more privileges, more independence. Why? Because the people have grown more intelligent and have now a better understanding of their rights.

So in our own country, everything has grown with this growth of intelligence, except in the fact of the Senate of the United States in reference to the right of the people to have a knowledge of what we are doing—the only part of the people to-day in this Government who have not advanced with the growth of the country, and who now stand back with a veil drawn between the people and themselves.

How have the privileges and rights of the people of this country grown? Step by step they have demanded and obtained rights from Congress; step by step they have demanded and obtained greater privileges and protection in the amendments of the Constitution of the United States, being fifteen amendments in all. Step by step this great Republic has moved forward; and the demands of the country have enlarged the boundaries of your Constitution. Step by step you have enlarged and expanded your laws. They must have a growth along with the intelligence of the people; they must expand with the necessities of the people. The only place where that growth has been stinted by its rules is in the Senate of the United States.

What was it that abolished slavery in this country? It was the immediate result of war all people say, but it was the intelligence of the people, their growth and advance in civilization, and the knowledge of the rights of man which caused that band which bound human beings to masters to be severed by war, and made the slave to leap forward ward as a free man before the civilized world.

While speaking of the advance in civilization and intelligence in the world we find here in our own midst another growth. While the idea of privileges to man has been in the advance, stimulated by the willingness of those in power to yield to their demands, on the other hand we find a growth in the power of money and corporations which has been unhealthy to the growth of republican ideas in our country. But whenever that growth becomes so overtowering, so colossal and powerful in its proportions that it becomes oppressive, then it is the duty of the representatives of the people to check and control that power. So it is with reference to everything else connected with the Government.

As we grow we must have our checks and our balances, in order that the idea of liberty and of privileges to men shall go along together and that one shall not be caused to shrink while the other grows, that all may move along harmoniously together. The way for us to do is to make wholesome laws and execute them to protect all lawful rights of every citizen. You will then have peace, prosperity, happiness, and fraternal feeling.

Let me go one step further. There are but two ways by which things are remedied when they become offensive and oppressive to the people. One is by revolution, which may and probably would destroy all government as well as liberty; the other is by reformation, which may amend all. So when the people in any land, I care not where, become oppressed or are denied rights they are entitled to enjoy, they will have them, and the legislation of the country must comport with the rights of the people or else one of two results must follow, either reformation or revolution. Reformation is my idea—law and order—reform as we move forward righting all the wrongs. That is the character of reformation which every man who is an honest man ought to desire instead of revolution.

Paul said, "When I was a child, I thought as a child; I spake as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things." We in the Senate of the United States are not children—we ought not to be; but when our Government was a child it dressed itself in a garb of secrecy. It was a child and it thought as a child, but when this great Government, majestic in all its proportions, became a man, why should it try to be a child any longer? Why should the Senate cling to the childish ways of the olden times that our acts may be obscured from the sight of men who gave us the places that we occupy? Let us put away childish things; let us put on the garb of a man, and assert the rights of the American people in this Senate Chamber to which they are entitled, for they are entitled to know what you and I do.

There is a strong desire on the part of a great many Senators to have secret sessions every day. It seems to bring joy to their very souls to see the people rushed out of these galleries, and the doors shut as if some great, mysterious thing was going to transpire, as if some great calamity was going to befall the country, and therefore the doors must be closed. In other words, you drive the people out of the galleries, and why? To show our importance? Is that it? To show that the Senate of the United States is a body of men who must have secrets of state? Is that it? Are we magicians? Will we turn sticks into snakes in secret, or something equally mysterious? Is there a Senator who does not know that it is a farce, an absolute farce? Nothing has ever transpired in the Senate in executive session in reference to the confirmation of a man, to my knowledge, that ought not to have been made public.

I want to see a vote on the pending resolution; I want to see Senators who announce that the world ought to know everything that is going on voting in executive sessions the same way that they talk on the floor when the doors are open. This mysterious thing of doing in secret what you will not do openly is not manly. It gives the chance for men to vote in secret one way and talk in open Senate another.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question suggested by a word which he used, and did not intend to use, I understand, whether the logic of the Senator's reasoning would not require that all committees of the Senate also should have their meetings openly and in public so far as conveniently may be done?

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; not at all. Why should the doors of committees not be open if the committees want them to be open? Is there any objection to it? I never did anything in a committee that I would not do in open day. It is a mere question for the committee themselves. If they do not want the public in to bother them they keep them out; but the public do not come into this Chamber to bother you. That is a very different proposition. You have no galleries in your committee-rooms, and what you do there is made public, is published every day. That is a mere question of convenience; but this is not a question of convenience, it is a question of the right of the people.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to draw the attention of the Senator to the point, because it seemed to me, though I probably misunderstood it, that the logic of his whole reasoning, and especially his last point, would make it the duty of the Senate committees as far as possible to open their doors. I suppose there is nothing which takes place in secret session so interesting and important to the people of this country as the proceedings of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, and especially the proceedings of the committees of conference from those two bodies when revenue questions are up. I wish to inquire of the Senator, if it does not divert him from his argument, whether he thinks that also should be made open and public.

Mr. LOGAN. I have always recognized the astuteness of the Senator from Massachusetts. Whenever a proposition is made that is not exactly in accord with his notion, if he can draw you off the track on to something else he is always anxious to do it. We are not discussing the question of committees, but we are discussing the question of executive sessions of the Senate of the United States, and committees have nothing whatever to do with this proposition. But there is this to be said in reference to it, a committee is raised for the purpose of transacting business that comes before the Senate. The nominations go before the committees, but here is the place where they are acted upon, and that action ought to be opened up. It is here in the Senate Chamber that the business is transacted; it is here in the Senate Chamber that the vote is taken; it is here in the Senate Chamber that nominations are passed upon and your final action determines the result. This is the place, and this is where the people want the doors opened, that they may see and know what we do.

The people have not asked you to open your committees, and they have not thought of it, unless you desire to open them; but they do say these Chamber doors should be opened, and not only that, but they will thunder at them until they are opened; and, mark what I tell you, they will be opened. It will not be long either. You gentlemen may revel in the dark for a while over nominations and delight yourselves to go out and know something that the people do not know.

"Oh, it charms me so; I am filled with knowledge that I can not give to the world; I have a great secret in my bosom that I can not give you." Some man asks, "Did you confirm this little postmaster down at Athens, in Tennessee?" "I can not inform you; I am bound to secrecy." What an important secret that is, as to whether a postmaster to a little office has been confirmed, and whether I voted for his confirmation or not! Oh, what a great veil this is that is drawn between the Senator and the people in reference to a little post-office!

In darker days, when the minds of men were not illumined as they are to-day by the common school and by books which are found everywhere, you might fool somebody by talking about the secrets which you possess; but that time has passed. The people of this country know as much as we do, and a great many of them who are in the humbler walks of life would make better Senators than many of us, doubtless. We find to-day in the Senate people different from those with which the Senate was filled once, when it was filled exclusively with lawyers, who supposed that they had all the wisdom of the world, that they controlled everything, that they wrote all the constitutions and draughted all the laws. These things were then done in order to keep up the mystery and shroud their course of conduct in darkness and cause the people to stand off in awe of them, and have them imagine a greatness that they could not fathom.

To-day we find it different. To-day in the Senate Chamber we find lawyers, we find miners, merchants, bankers, lumbermen, and men in the different avocations of life. The people elect their men according to what they think is their business qualification for the purpose of legislating to advance their interests. No longer is this mystery thrown around the aristocracy of this country which once assembled for the purpose of blinding and keeping from the people that knowledge which they were entitled to have.

No, sir, this Government is growing, it is growing in republican ideas, in republican feelings, it is growing in the interest of the people.

Growth in the wrong direction must cease and it will cease. The growth in this country which has been in the direction of depriving men of their rights at the polls or their rights anywhere else will have to cease. The growth calculated to oppress will be checked. I warn my friends here that the people of this country will know what you do. They will open these doors and they will look in upon you. They are entitled to; and until these doors are opened the people of this country can not say that all have an opportunity of ascertaining a full knowledge of the workings of his Government; and the man who is deprived of the knowledge he ought to have in order to be well informed is deprived to that extent of the privileges he ought to be permitted to enjoy.

It is only by degrees that liberty comes. It is only by degrees that liberty is repressed, and the degree that you repress the intelligence of the people as to the action of their representatives to that extent you repress their liberties and the privileges they should enjoy.

Let the Senate turn its eye to the house of lords in England, where power comes not from the people, where they are born with certain rights and privileges, where they are made lords without the consent of the people. To-day they are trembling and tottering, and the time will soon come when the house of lords in England will be made by the people of England.

Let the Senate not pattern longer after the house of lords; let the Senate not pattern longer after its star-chamber proceedings, but let it, as a free, independent body of the representatives of a free and independent people, open the doors and let the light, if any can emanate from the Senate, flash across the continent, that every intelligent man in the land may understand how the duty as performed by the Senator is performed, whether in the direction of patriotic devotion to the interests of the country or not. In all these things let the country understand and know what is being done. Let the people be no longer misled; let them no longer be made to believe that there is some mystery about secret sessions; let them be made no longer to believe that there is something transpiring here which would not transpire with open doors; let them be made no longer to believe that they are not our equals. When we declare that the people of this country are our equals, that each and every man is the equal of each and every other man before the law, let not their representatives imagine that they are higher than the people, that they are better than the people, or that they have secrets of state which can not be imparted to the people who have trusted them.

You who are trusted by the people can not trust them. Is that the rule, that the man trusted can not trust the men who trust him? Whenever I fail to trust the people of my State who have trusted me, who have given me their confidence as a legislator for them, whenever I shall come to the conclusion that I am so far above them that I can not trust them with what I do as a legislative or executive act, then I will come to the conclusion that I myself have become aristocratic and that I am greater than those who made me what I am. Do not imagine yourselves greater than those who made you what you are; you are not. Those who make Senators can unmake Senators; those who make Representatives can unmake Representatives. So, too, with the President and all power in this land; the power that makes them can unmake them, and the power that makes them ought to unmake them if they have no confidence in that power.

Mr. President, open these doors! open these doors! Let the knowledge go out to the people. The people are outside; they wish to see inside. Ah, Mr. President, we are on the inside now, but political life is short at best; we may soon be on the outside and have a desire to look inside. Take away this mystery; stop this grand farce.

I thank the Senators for giving me so kind and courteous a hearing.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the pension bill, which was partially disposed of yesterday during the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service, who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to say that I would have been glad to ask for a vote at this time on the resolution which has been under discussion this morning, but I am advised that one or two other Senators desire to speak upon it, and I trust we may go on with it to-morrow morning. I will ask the Senate to vote upon it at as early a day as is possible.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President I wish to make a brief explanation of my substitute offered yesterday morning before the motion to take up the pension bill——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pension bill has been taken up.

Mr. BLAIR. Did the Senator ask me a question?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I said I wanted to make a statement to the Senate about the substitute I offered yesterday morning in the morning hour for the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut. I wish to withdraw it.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator desires to occupy a few moments I have no objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I shall at the same time continue to contend for the consideration of this resolution during the morning hour as against all Calendar business. Even if I have to consume the morning hour in its discussion myself, I will do so. The pension bill is Calendar business. This resolution is peculiarly morning-hour business, and can be cut off at 2 o'clock by a mere rap of the gavel, as has been done time and again.

I was going to say, however, Mr. President, that yesterday morning I offered a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut. I did it under the apprehension that it was the rule of the Senate that the adoption of his resolution in the form proposed by him requires a two-thirds vote. The substitute which I offered——

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia what his proposal is at this time? I have only twenty-five minutes to complete the consideration of this bill, and I desire the Senate to complete it. I can not yield to a speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia has the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well, if he is discussing the pending bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. As I said, and I hope the Senator from New Hampshire understood it, I offered a proposition as a substitute, believing that the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut required a two-thirds vote. On examination I find that the Senate has changed the rule which obtains in what is called Jefferson's Manual, and that a majority vote is sufficient to carry either proposition. Therefore I withdraw my substitute. That was my only object. A majority of the Senate can change a rule any morning they shall please to do so.

Now, sir, I am opposed to taking up the pension bill or any other bill in the morning hour until this resolution is disposed of. If I appear to be forcing the fight (if I may so express it) on this matter I shall be excused for it. I presume that, when I recall the attention of the Senate to the fact that I think I introduced the original proposition some time in December, certainly within the first month of the session, and now if we give way in the morning hour with the intention on the part of certain Senators here to defeat it by any and all motions, if possible, there can be no chance of its passing during this session.

I shall therefore, as I have said, consume every minute of the morning hour rather than have this resolution run over again by those who are opposed to its passing by urging the consideration of bills which seem to be more patriotic. I believe that closed sessions and closed doors—secret sessions—are in violation of every principle upon which this Government is founded. I believe they are violative of the Constitution itself; and that there can be no authority found in the Constitution for executive sessions except for special purposes. The House of Representatives has a right to have its secret sessions, as named in the Constitution, for special purposes. Here we sit from 12 to 1, for instance, and two Senators can say that every citizen of the United States shall be expelled from the gallery in order to take up something that must be considered secretly. There is no such authority given in the Constitution under which we are acting and which is the limitation of our powers. Then the doors can be thrown open on the motion of some Senator to take up something else, or without the doors being thrown open—I give away no executive secret when I mention it—a Senator can rise here and say, "I ask that the doors shall be considered to be open (though they are closed) for the purpose of introducing a public bill." That is done here almost every day.

Now, sir, I undertake to say that either the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut or the resolution of the Senator from Illinois will leave it in the power of the Senate to open or close the doors, as the Constitution provides that a majority may do on any question. It only provides that and nothing more. It does not give two men a right to close the doors upon the people of this country. Why, sir, you bring a man in here and you put him on trial for felony when he is nominated by the President of the United States for an office, and you say that he has been a horse thief and a convicted felon, you say that he has served a term in the penitentiary; and he has no opportunity of being heard. You take a man who is guilty of murder, who is guilty of the highest crime known, and you would not dare to try him in a county courthouse unless he were confronted by his accusers and every witness was present and every word uttered for or against him during the progress of the trial was public. If it were done otherwise, he could set the whole proceedings aside. This is the Constitution and the constitutional provision for the protection of personal liberty; but it seems that the Senate of the United States assumes that it can try any American citizen and say that he is fit or unfit for an office, without giving that citizen an opportunity to be heard.

I tell you, Mr. President, addressing the Senate through you, sir, as I am obliged under the rules to do, that it smacks smartly of cowardice. I have never yet known a man to be put on trial before any jury of his countrymen—I have never yet known a jury that were willing to try a man—unless he were confronted by his accusers and had his witnesses present, until I got into the Senate of the United States. That this body—I may call it the supreme law-making body—should itself violate a fundamental principle of fair trial is remarkable to me. It is upon that principle mainly that I rested my proposition, in its inception, to open the doors and let every man know what was said for or against him, and let the country know the reasons for our action.

I have heard it said that the scandalous accusations brought against men would prolong the session. I do not believe it, sir. You open the doors and leave every man who makes an accusation responsible to him whom he has accused and you will find fewer of such subjects discussed and fewer men to take part in their debate. I will instance a case, if I can do so within the rules. I will take a man, for instance, who is nominated by the President of the United States to be a Solicitor-General or an Assistant Attorney-General. Let the doors be opened and accusations made and discussed in open session, and the debate will be concluded in much less time than if you have secret sessions, where no responsibility rests.

I believe moreover that open sessions would improve what we call the civil-service rules; we should have real civil service honestly and better when the nominations of civil-service commissioners were sent in here if we had open sessions to consider them. In secret session we all know that Senators make short speeches, and they disavow any purpose of accusation in what they say, saying things which are expressed in language that nobody understands. In open session a Senator has to express himself to the country, and not to the smoking congregation of this body.

I believe if you open the doors and let every nomination be fairly discussed here, every character be analyzed, every accusation against personal character be duly investigated, that you will have a better class of men performing the public service. Why, sir, the President himself, just prior to the meeting of this Congress, invited even the Republicans to come and state to him anything that they knew went to the fitness or the unfitness of any of his appointees. Who went? I do not know. I have never seen him. Republicans, he invited you to go there and tell him what you knew of the personal character and fitness of a man. Why should we not discuss both in this body and let the country know about them? You say that these secrets get out. Then why not let the facts go out without being secret? Why not let the truth go instead of falsehood? How do they get out? If I were permitted to guess I could tell. I have a private secretary, for instance, and I consider him particularly private. I walk down the Avenue with him and he asks me a question or two, and being smarter than I am, he knows more in five minutes than I learn in a week. Then he gives it to somebody else, and the whole newspaper fraternity get it; and my observation is that if you were to undertake to exchange intelligence the newspaper men would have the best of this Senate by a large majority. That is the way the secrets get out. That is the way the secrets of the executive sessions get out all the time.

Another reason why I am in favor of open sessions is that then they can not misrepresent you. The newspaper fraternity, like every religious denomination or the masonic fraternity or a temperance association or anything else will have some unreliable men among them, and an instance occurred here last week that I particularly noticed because I was most concerned in it. Almost all the papers which I saw stated nearly the exact facts. There was one here representing, or supposed to be hired to misrepresent—I would like to make it as moderate as possible—misrepresenting a Representative in the House of Representatives, and that just took the facts which all the others reported and reversed them, and put my name in the place of the other man. He would not have dared to do so if we had had open sessions.

Mr. President, I will yield the floor now to take up the pension bill. Will that deprive this resolution of its priority to-morrow morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour; either the pending bill or the resolution in respect to secret sessions would have to be taken up on motion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If the pension bill is taken up, would that deprive this resolution of its priority to-morrow morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not. Neither of them has any priority in the morning hour, but must be taken up on motion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I yield the floor.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. BLAIR. I remind the Senator that the pension bill is up. He has been speaking on the pension bill. Now I ask for a vote on the pension bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service, who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read at length.

Mr. COCKRELL. To-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yesterday. Does the Senator desire that it be read again?

Mr. COCKRELL. No. Is there a report with it?

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that there is no report, and that no amendment is reported. The bill will be read again at the request of the Senator from Tennessee.

The Chief Clerk began to read the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the reading proceeds further I wish to say that the bill has been twice read to the Senate already since the debate commenced.

Mr. HARRIS. We can not hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Chair—I do not know whether the Chair can answer the question—whether it is the expectation that the interstate-commerce bill will proceed at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It comes up as the unfinished business at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I appeal to my friend from New Hampshire that a bill of this great magnitude ought not to be dealt with in the three minutes left before 2 o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR. I will remind the Senator from Massachusetts that he has had ample opportunity to know in the present condition of the business of the Senate that the bill has been up three times. It has been kicked and buffeted about beyond any abuse I ever saw put on any pension legislation in this or the other body, and I am utterly disgusted at the manner in which this bill and all pension legislation at this session has been treated by the Senate. I have never seen anything like it in either House of Congress; and unless there can be some understanding that the Pension Committee is to be treated in regard to its reports in the Senate as it has been at former sessions, for one I shall feel under the necessity of asking to be entirely excused from further service on the committee.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend will exonerate me from any disrespect.

Mr. BLAIR. I exonerate the Senator from any disrespect certainly, but Senators seem to forget the course of procedure in reference to this bill. In the first place, it was called up some three weeks ago and discussed, and by the exercise of the most malicious and ludicrous malignity on the part of several Senators they used up the few minutes we had then. It went over a fortnight. Senators wanted to be heard without reference to anything that was pending in the Senate, and this continuous babble about secret sessions and open sessions has interfered with it, and everything that all the dictionary nonsense that it was possible to concert seemed to be combined for the purpose apparently of defeating this pension legislation.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend will pardon me——

Mr. BLAIR. I would like a vote on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has called for the reading of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to hear the bill read.

Mr. BLAIR. That will make three times it has been read to the Senate already.

Mr. HARRIS. If it makes the fortieth time, I ask for the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. CAMDEN obtained the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from West Virginia will yield to me I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, in accordance with notice given yesterday.

Mr. CAMDEN. I yield.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question on the motion the Chair will present a House bill for reference.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7481) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 4, 1885, certain information relative to claims of Pottawatomie Indians; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 82) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880;

A bill (S. 141) to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," to the port of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska; and Joint resolution (S. R. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 444) to amend section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 5789) to amend section 2552 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 6637) relating to contested-election cases; and

A bill (H. R. 7465) to amend section 3357 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 2 of the act of June 9, 1880, and section 3389 of said Revised Statutes as amended by section 16 of the act of March, 1879.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and thirty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate the 15th day of April, 1886.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Charles A. Spofford, to be collector of customs for the district of Castine, in the State of Maine, vice William H. Sargent, term expired.

POSTMASTERS.

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and to ask its immediate consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 12, 1886.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to the House a schedule of all claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury since the allowance of those embraced in House Executive Document No. 70.

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a schedule of all claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury since the allowance of those embraced in House Executive Document No. 70, having considered the same, report it back herewith, and recommend its adoption with the following amendment: At the end of line 3, after the word "Treasury," insert the following words: "Under appropriations, the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund, under the provisions of section 5 of the act approved June 20, 1874."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was then adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 7632) to establish a light-ship off the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay; when the Speaker signed the same.

INDIAN COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The next business is the call of committees for the consideration of bills; and the pending question is on a bill (H. R. 6973) to provide for the appointment of a commission to inspect and report on the condition of Indians, Indian affairs, and for other purposes, which comes over from a previous morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has sixteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is, of the first hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has sixteen minutes of his time. There is one hour afterward.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I would ask the gentleman if this can not be passed over by unanimous consent until to-morrow, retaining its place without prejudice?

Mr. MORRISON. No; to-morrow is private bill day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will state that a request has been made by gentlemen connected with the Committee on Territories that this bill should be allowed to go over to a later date, Tuesday, perhaps, of next week is the latest, without losing its place under the call. If we can have the right of way on Tuesday for the consideration of the bill I shall make no objection to the request for the purpose of accommodating the gentlemen who make this suggestion. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, to be entitled to consideration for one hour on Tuesday in the usual time.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I further request that any gentlemen who desire to propose amendments to the bill may be permitted to present them and have them considered as pending.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO HOUSE BILL 6973.

Mr. HOLMAN moved the following amendments to House bill 6973:

First. Fill up the blank in line 6, first section, with the word "major."

Second. Fill up the blank in third line of the fifth section with the word "ten," and in the fourteenth line of same section with the words "ten thousand."

Third. In line 16 of fifth section, after the word "commission," the following words: "not drawing salaries, nine thousand."

Fourth. Strike out the word "five," after the word "twenty," in twenty-second line of the fifth section.

By Mr. CUTCHEON:

1. Amend the title of the bill to read as follows:

"A bill to provide for reorganizing and further defining the duties of the Board of Indian Commissioners, and for other purposes."

2. Amend section 1 of said bill so that it shall read as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to reorganize the Board of Indian Commissioners, so as to make it to consist of seven persons, two of whom may be detailed from the officers of the Army, who shall report to the Secretary of the Interior for duty, the other members to be appointed from the existing board, from civil life, or detailed from officers in the service of the Department of the Interior. And when said Board of Indian Commissioners shall be so appointed, the organization and functions of the present Board of Indian Commissioners shall cease and determine. It shall be the duty of the said reorganized Board of Indian Commissioners to perform all duties heretofore intrusted to and performed by the Board of Indian Commissioners; and they shall inspect all goods and supplies purchased for the Indian service, and advise the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to the purchase of such goods and supplies. It shall also be the duty of said commissioners, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to inspect from time to time, as he may require, the condition of the Indians of the various tribes and bands on the different reservations under the care, control, or jurisdiction of the United States."

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Elections to call up the bill (H. R. 6637) relating to contested elections and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 127 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be so amended as to read as follows:

"All officers taking testimony to be used in a contested-election case, whether by deposition or otherwise, shall, when the taking of the same is completed, and without unnecessary delay, certify and carefully seal and immediately forward the same, by mail or by express, addressed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.; and shall also indorse upon the envelope containing such deposition or testimony the name of the case in which it is taken, together with the name of the party in whose behalf it is taken, and shall subscribe such indorsement.

"The Clerk of the House of Representatives, upon the receipt of such deposition or testimony, shall file the same with the clerk of the Committee on Elections. As soon as all the testimony relating to any case is received by the clerk of the Committee on Elections he shall notify the contestant and the contestee by registered letter through the mails to appear at the committee-room at the Capitol, in person or by attorney, at a reasonable time to be named, not exceeding twenty days from the mailing of such letter, for the purpose of being present at the opening of the sealed packages of testimony and of agreeing upon the parts thereof to be printed. Upon the day appointed for such meeting the clerk of the committee shall proceed to open all the packages of testimony in the case in the presence of the parties or their attorneys, and such portions of the testimony as the parties may agree to have printed shall be printed by the Public Printer, under the direction of the clerk of the committee; and in case of disagreement between the parties as to the printing of any portion of the testimony, the said clerk shall determine whether such portion of the testimony shall be printed; and the said clerk shall prepare a suitable index to be printed with the record.

"If either party, after having been duly notified, shall fail to attend, by himself or by an attorney, the clerk of the committee shall proceed to open the packages, and shall cause such portions of the testimony as he shall be of opinion ought to be printed.

"He shall carefully seal up and preserve the portions of the testimony not printed, as well as the other portions, when returned from the Public Printer, and lay the same before the Committee on Elections at the earliest opportunity. As soon as the testimony in any case is printed, the clerk of the Committee on Elections shall forward by mail, if desired, two copies thereof to the contestant and the same number to the contestee, and shall notify the contestant to file with the clerk of the committee within thirty days a brief of the facts and the authorities relied on to establish his case. The clerk of the committee shall forward by mail two copies of the contestant's brief to the contestee, with like notice.

"Upon receipt of the contestee's brief the clerk shall forward two copies thereof to the contestant, who may, if he desires, reply to new matter in the contestee's brief within like time. All briefs shall be printed at the expense of the parties respectively, and shall be of like folio as the printed record; and sixty copies thereof shall be filed with the clerk of the committee."

SEC. 2. That the clerk of the Committee on Elections shall hold his office until his successor is appointed and qualified. He shall receive for his services $2,000 per annum; and he shall prepare, when directed by the committee, for publication, a digest of election cases, but shall not be entitled to additional compensation therefor.

Mr. TURNER. I ask that the report be also read.

The report (by Mr. TURNER) is as follows:

The Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the bill relating to contested elections (H. R. 6637), have had the same under consideration, and recommend its passage.

By the present practice the printing of the evidence and preparation of the briefs in contested elections can not be done until the Committee on Elections is appointed and organized.

The object of this bill is to have the evidence printed and the briefs filed before the new Congress meets. By this arrangement it is believed that the work of the committee can be advanced at least two months, and the titles to the disputed seats can be determined before the other business of the House is ready for consideration.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to supply an omission which was made in the draught of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 37, section 1, the following words:

"And the notice of contest and the answer of the sitting member shall also be printed with the record."

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question, with his permission.

Mr. TURNER. I yield for a question.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to inquire if the Committee on Elections consider, if this bill be enacted into a law, it will be effective in securing the taking of testimony in the manner there provided?

Mr. TURNER. Has the gentleman concluded his question?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER. I desire to state in reply to the gentleman from Rhode Island that this bill does not attempt to alter in any respect the present statute governing election contests, except in the particular that it requires the printing of the record by the Public Printer before the new Congress commences, and for that purpose I think the bill will be thoroughly effectual.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TURNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REAPPRAISEMENT OF CERTAIN IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means I ask immediate consideration of a resolution on the House Calendar, reported from that committee, in regard to the reappraisement of imported merchandise.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to proceed to hear and determine the charges made by L. Lehmann, as he was proceeding to do at the time of the passage of the resolution of the House, and that he report the result thereof to the House of Representatives at the earliest possible date consistent with a proper determination of the question at issue.

Mr. HEWITT. There is a report also preceding this resolution, which I ask to have read.

The report (by Mr. HEWITT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means have had under consideration the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitted in response to a resolution of the House, adopted December 21, 1885, calling for copies of letters and documents relating to the application of L. Lehmann for a reappraisement of certain imported merchandise. They find that Lehmann has filed charges with the Secretary of the Treasury that there was collusion between the examiner and merchant appraiser in this case, by which his invoice was fraudulently raised, and he was compelled to pay duties not lawfully imposed by statute. They find further that the Secretary of the Treasury informed Lehmann that he had no power to set aside a reappraisement, unless it could be clearly shown that the appraising officers acted unlawfully or dishonestly.

It appears further that on the 26th of December Lehmann notified the Secretary of the Treasury that he was prepared to furnish proof of fraud or of a fraudulent conspiracy between the merchant appraiser and certain custom-house officers at the port of New York in respect to the appraisement and reappraisement of the merchandise in controversy.

Meanwhile, to wit, on the 21st of December, the House passed the resolution calling for the letters and documents in the case, whereupon Lehmann was informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that, pending the investigation of Congress, no further action would be taken by the Secretary in reference to his offer to prove fraud.

The committee are of opinion that a resolution calling for letters and documents ought not to delay or hinder an investigation by the Department of charges of fraud against its officials. They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution.

Mr. HEWITT. Unless some further information is demanded with respect to this resolution, I move that it be put upon its passage. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OR LANDING OF MACKEREL.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to call up the bill (H. R. 5538) relating to the importing of mackerel caught during the spawning season. This is on the House Calendar, and the report is No. 343.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I now move to postpone the further consideration of this bill to the 18th day of May, after the second call of committees.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas desire to fix the hour? However, he will have control of that matter himself, in the event of the adoption of his motion, and can call it up at any time during that day.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not know that this committee will be called at that time.

The SPEAKER. The right of consideration would not be affected by that. Whether the committee is called or not the gentleman could call it up any time during the day.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Could its consideration be postponed simply to the 18th day of May and then be called up at any time during the day?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Arkansas, if adopted, would make it in order to call it up at any time on that day.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas to postpone the further consideration of this bill to the time fixed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORT OF OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (S. 141) to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," to the port of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise conferred by the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, as provided for as to the ports mentioned in section 7 of said act.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will only say the committee addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he advised this extension of the privileges of the act to the port of Omaha be granted. Unless some gentleman wishes to make some inquiries or remarks I will ask for a vote on the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORTS OF PORTLAND AND PORT TOWNSEND.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 82) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Portland, Oreg.; and that the privileges of the first and seventh sections of said act be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Port Townsend, in Washington Territory.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORTS OF KEY WEST AND TAMPA.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call up for consideration the joint resolution (S. R. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the provisions of the first and seventh sections of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, be extended to the port of Key West, Fla.; and that the provisions of the seventh section of the same act be extended to Tampa, Fla. And all the other provisions of said act shall apply to both said ports and to all goods and merchandise therein mentioned.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call up for consideration the bill H. R. 4007.

The SPEAKER. The bill H. R. 4007 is on the Private Calendar, the Chair is advised. It is to admit free certain articles for the benefit of a church.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does a bill of that character go to the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It does. It is for the benefit of a private institution.

Mr. SPRINGER. But it has relation to the revenue.

The SPEAKER. So has every bill which appropriates money; but if it is for the benefit of a private individual or corporation it is a private bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Is it in order to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. Not in this hour, because this hour is devoted to business of a particular class.

BONDS OF BREWERS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to call up for consideration from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 444) to amend section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3336. Every brewer, on filing notice as aforesaid of his intention to commence or continue business, shall execute a bond to the United States, to be approved by the collector of the district, in a sum equal to three times the amount of the tax which, in the opinion of the collector, said brewer will be liable to pay during any one month, and conditioned that he shall pay, or cause to be paid, as herein provided, the tax required by law on all beer, lager-beer, ale, porter, and other fermented liquors made by or for him, before the same is sold or removed for consumption or sale, except as hereinafter provided; and that he shall keep, or cause to be kept, a book, in the manner and for the purposes hereinafter specified, which shall be open to inspection by the proper officers, as by law required; and that he shall in all respects faithfully comply, without fraud or evasion, with all requirements of law relating to the manufacture and sale of any malt liquors aforesaid; and he shall execute a new bond, whenever required so to do by said collector, in the amount above named and conditioned as above provided, which bond shall be in lieu of any former bond or bonds of such brewer in respect to all liabilities accruing after its approval by said collector."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The only change in the law proposed by this amendment is that whereas, under the present law, the brewers give an annual bond for twice the amount of the tax that is supposed to be payable during any one month, this makes the bond a continuing perpetual bond for three times the amount, with power in the collector to require a new bond whenever in his judgment it should be demanded. The act was submitted to the Bureau of Internal Revenue and approved by it as being in every way equal to the present statute and removing an unnecessary burden from the brewer, and removing also the questions that occasionally arise as to the effect of the lapse of time and the failure to renew the bond upon the security. That is the sole object of it. If there is no further explanation demanded, I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MANUFACTURERS OF TOBACCO.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I call up from the House Calendar for consideration the bill (H. R. 7465) to amend section 3357 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 2 of the act of June 9, 1880, and section 3389 of said Revised Statutes, as amended by section 16 of the act of March 1, 1879.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3357 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 2 of the act of June 9, 1880, be further amended and re-enacted so as to read as follows:

"Every collector shall keep a record, in a book or books provided for the purpose, to be open to the inspection of only the proper officers of internal revenue, including deputy collectors and internal-revenue agents, of the name and residence of every person engaged in the manufacture of tobacco or snuff in his district, the place where such manufacture is carried on, and the number of the manufactory; and he shall enter in said record, under the name of each manufacturer, a copy of every inventory required by law to be made by such manufacturer, and an abstract of his monthly returns; and he shall cause the several manufactories of tobacco or snuff in his district to be numbered consecutively, which numbers shall not be thereafter changed, except for reasons satisfactory to himself and approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

SEC. 2. That section 3389 of said Revised Statutes, as amended by section 16 of the act of March 1, 1879, be further amended and re-enacted so as to read as follows:

"Every collector shall keep a record, in a book provided for that purpose, to be open to the inspection of only the proper officers of internal revenue, including deputy collectors and internal-revenue agents, of the name and residence of every person engaged in the manufacture of cigars in his district, the place where such manufacture is carried on, and the number of the manufactory; and he shall enter in said record, under the name of each manufacturer, an abstract of his inventories and monthly returns; and he shall cause the several manufacturers of cigars in the district to be numbered consecutively, which number shall not thereafter be changed."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The sole change that is made by this bill in the present statute law is that in each of the sections as they stand now are the words, "to be open to the inspection of any person." Under the law as it now is, the manufacturers of snuff, tobacco, and cigars are compelled to file certain schedules, inventories, and reports, which taken together reveal all their private business, and the formulas under and by which all their manufactures are made, and which, if examined by a competitor or rival, give to that competitor or rival all the business secrets of the manufacturer. The committee did not think the Government ought to go partners in this improper sort of business method, and give to others the means of obtaining this secret information. They have therefore simply stricken out the words "to be open to the inspection of any person," and inserted the words, "to be open to the inspection of only the proper officers of internal revenue, including deputy collectors and internal-revenue agents;" this particular clause having been draughted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as being entirely ample for the purposes of revenue. If there is no further explanation desired, I shall ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORT OF ENTRY, CAPE CHARLES CITY.

Mr. HEWITT. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to call up House bill No. 5789, to amend section 2552 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That paragraph 1 of section 2552 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by striking out "Cherrystone," in the sixth line, and inserting in lieu thereof "Cape Charles City;" so that it will read "Cape Charles City shall be the port of entry," &c.

Mr. HEWITT. This bill changes the port of entry from Cherrystone to Cape Charles City, because a railroad has been constructed and a new terminus made. It is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Has the bill been reported from the committee?

Mr. HEWITT. It has been duly reported and the report filed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEWITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPORT TOBACCO MANUFACTORIES AND DRAWBACK.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to call up from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 2522) to authorize the establishment of export tobacco manufactories, and for drawback upon imported articles used in manufacturing exported tobacco.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, as there is not much time left to be occupied by this committee, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House without going to the Committee of the Whole. This will give us further time, so that we may complete or rather pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. There are twenty-two minutes left. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated be considered in the House without going to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to offer to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The course proposed will not prevent that unless the previous question is demanded and ordered by the House.

The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill as above.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] moves that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read, and that the bill be considered in the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful to establish export-tobacco manufactories for the manufacture of tobacco exclusively for exportation, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and that the provisions of section 3433 of the United States Revised Statutes, and sections 14 and 15 of the act of May 28, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the laws in relation to internal revenue," so far as applicable, shall be in force in respect to such export tobacco manufactories; and that the same drawback shall be allowed to a manufacturer who shall use sugar or molasses in his export tobacco manufactory upon which an import duty has been paid that would be allowed under existing laws to a person exporting the same, such drawback to be allowed and paid as now provided for by law.

SEC. 2. That exports of manufactured tobacco not produced in export tobacco manufactories shall be entitled to a drawback of 90 per cent. of the duty upon such imported articles as are actually used in the manufacture of such exported tobacco, upon such evidence and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report which accompanies the bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 232) to authorize the establishment of export-tobacco manufactories, report:

That the committee have had said bill under consideration, and find that for many years a large business has been done in the exportation of manufactured tobacco; that at this time more than 10,000,000 pounds per annum of tobacco manufactured in the United States is exported for consumption in foreign countries.

It also appears that in the course of manufacturing said tobacco large quantities of sugar, licorice, licorice-paste, rum, alcohol, and other articles are used, upon which customs duties or internal-revenue taxes are levied and collected by the United States.

It also appears that these duties and taxes add so materially to the cost of manufacture that American manufacturers of tobacco for export find themselves at great disadvantage in foreign markets in competition with manufacturers of other countries, who are relieved from such duties and taxes.

Upon a consideration of the facts, your committee have reached the conclusion that it will be wise to relieve American manufactured tobacco exported to foreign countries from this burden, as a means of stimulating and increasing our foreign trade in this important article of manufacture.

Your committee call attention to the fact that this subject was referred to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion. The Secretary referred the subject to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for his views, and that officer reported that—

"As it is evidently sound policy to favor the exportation of domestic products, I would recommend the enactment of the bill into law."

Secretary Folger, in transmitting the letter of Commissioner Evans, said:

"In further response to your inquiries, I will add that I see no practical difficulties in the way of executing the law if it be enacted, it appearing to be entirely consonant with the existing laws authorizing the establishment of manufacturing warehouses for the manufacture of medicines, preparations, compositions, perfumery, cosmetics, cordials, and other liquors exclusively for exportation.

"The interests concerned are shown to be now quite large, though placed at considerable disadvantage, and it would seem that they are equally as deserving of the fostering care of the Government as the other interests named."

And the bill also meets the approval of the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Your committee therefore report said bill back to the House of Representatives, and recommend its passage."

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman has kindly yielded to me. I want to offer an amendment to the second section of the bill. I move to strike out, in the third line of the second section, the words "90 per cent." and insert the words "the whole amount;" so that it will read, "that exports of manufactured tobacco not produced in export tobacco manufactories shall be entitled to a drawback of the whole amount of the duty paid upon such imported articles as are actually used in the manufacture of such exported tobacco upon such evidence and under such regulations as shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a moment in support of the amendment which I have offered. I approve, of course, of the object of this bill. There are two classes of manufactories embraced in it. Those who manufacture tobacco exclusively for exportation get under the first section of the bill such imported articles as are used in the manufacture of their tobacco without the payment of any duty. Those manufacturers who are engaged in the manufacture of tobacco for home consumption as well as for exportation are required to pay the duty in the first instance, and under the provisions of the second section of this bill are entitled to a drawback of only 90 per cent. Thus it will be seen that the two classes of manufacturers are not put upon terms of equality. I understand the purpose of retaining the 10 per cent. to be to cover any probable cost which may be occasioned to the Government by the allowance of the drawback. Tobacco, Mr. Speaker, is taxed in three ways. There is a tax of 8 cents a pound upon all manufactured tobacco. The manufacturer pays in addition a special tax and the fees of the inspector of his tobacco. These inspectors can guard and protect the interests of the Government against the possibility of fraud if this bill be passed. These officers are in the manufactories every day, and they can perform every duty which is required under the provisions of this act, and I can see no necessity for the retention of 10 per cent. of the tax. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that tobacco is already taxed largely. Twenty-six millions have reached the Treasury as the result of taxation of tobacco during the present year, and the object of this bill is simply to enable these manufacturers of tobacco to go to the foreign markets and there enter into competition with tobacco manufactured in Canada, in Australia, and in other portions of the world.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WISE. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. The general law as to rebate applicable to all other articles exported reserves 10 per cent. to pay the expense of collecting and refunding the rebate. Now, why should we make an exception in this instance?

Mr. WISE. I have already told the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] that the retention of 10 per cent. is not necessary in this case, because the manufacturers are already taxed (I think unjustly) for the payment of the fees of the inspectors, who can and will perform all the duties mentioned by the gentleman, and the allowance of the drawback will entail no expense upon the Government. In the case of cosmetics and medicines the manufacturers are not called upon to pay the fees of the officers employed to protect the Government against fraud. But the tobacco manufacturers are already taxed to pay the fees of the officers of the Government.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] and myself represent probably the largest tobacco manufacturing interest in the world. I am entirely satisfied with this amendment. It would be very unfair to the large manufacturing interests of my district if they were compelled to erect separate buildings for making up this export tobacco. The Lorillards are located in my district, and pay I think a million dollars in revenue to the Government every year, besides employing thousands of people. To allow them the same rebate that will be given to manufacturers having separate buildings will be only a matter of justice. To pass this bill as it is now will be to revolutionize their entire establishment and that of the other tobacco manufactories. It will cause them more additional expense than any possible rebate to meet its requirements. It is not necessary to have a separate building, as the manufacture is now under thorough Government inspection in all its departments; and besides, the bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury full discretion to make all necessary rules to prevent frauds on the revenue. This invidious distinction of one factory against another will derange and damage the whole tobacco trade.

Mr. DUNN. They import in bond, do they not, articles they use in the manufacture of tobacco for export, and therefore avoid the expense of collection and refunding which would exist in the case of a rebate?

Mr. McADOO. My objection to the bill in its present form is that it would compel these manufacturers to erect separate buildings in which to manufacture their export tobacco, or they would lose the 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNN. That is, if they import in bond articles to be used in the manufacture.

Mr. McADOO. As they undoubtedly do. This bill will seriously damage many establishments and injure instead of aid the trade unless amended. If a person or company has a large establishment he or they must upset their works; if a small manufactory, the great expense of new buildings must be undergone. Fraud can be perpetrated in the one case as well as in the other.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire the House to understand that this bill was maturely considered by a subcommittee and still more so by the full Committee of Ways and Means. The committee has presented the bill to the House without amendment. The bill is a bantling of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], drawn by himself.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman will allow me to say that it was not drawn by myself. It was drawn, at the instance of a very large manufacturer, by another gentleman. I offered it at his request.

Mr. HARRIS. I speak by authority of the superscription of the bill. I know nothing of the details.

I wish to say to the House, as some members probably have not attended closely to the reading of the report, that we regard this as a business proposition solely in the interest of the exportation of manufactured tobacco to other countries. We are satisfied that those who are engaged in the manufacture of tobacco for export have resting upon them an incubus of taxation which does not apply to manufacturers in foreign countries; and the result, in one instance, has been to drive out of the city of Danville a capitalist having in plant and fixtures for the manufacture of tobacco for export several hundred thousand dollars. He has had to turn his back upon his home and move his establishment to Australia. This is the effect of this incubus as it attaches to all articles manufactured in this country for export.

Mr. DUNN. I did not know the tariff increased the price of anything.

Mr. HARRIS. That is a debatable question, and we remand it to a future day. I simply wanted to make this explanation in justification of the Committee on Ways and Means, who reported the bill, I believe, without dissent.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will allow me to say I think this bill is right in principle, but I would like to inquire, why not extend it to all other manufacturing operations? There is a bill, I think, before the committee to that effect.

Mr. MORRISON. Well, neither the world nor all export manufacturing interests were created in a day. So let us do a little at a time. We are going just as fast as we can. This measure has merit, it is plain, and may be passed in the hour allotted and but a small part of which is left to us.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has said about all I care to say. I wish to add, however, that our friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] is rather hard to please in all that relates to tobacco. I did suppose, when we had reported after mature consideration his bill, word for word and letter for letter as he introduced it and asked us to report it, he would be satisfied; but it seems he is not. He now offers an amendment. His amendment gives a drawback of all duties paid on articles imported and used in tobacco for export. The bill as reported gives back but 90 per cent. if the tobacco is manufactured elsewhere than in an exporting manufacturing warehouse.

Now a word by way of explaining the discrimination made in the bill; I mean this difference of 10 per cent. in amount of drawback. The bill is intended to encourage the building of tobacco exporting warehouses; and where tobacco is manufactured for export in such an establishment we propose to remit all the taxes paid on articles imported and used in the manufacture. Where in any establishment tobacco is manufactured, part for export and part to be sold and consumed at home, we propose to retain 10 per cent. of the tax, so as to encourage the building of export warehouses. The reason is, where tobacco for export is made in the same establishment with tobacco manufactured for home consumption there may be some cheating. The object of retaining the 10 per cent. tax in the latter case is to offer inducement—10 per cent. of the tax—for the manufacture of export tobacco in separate warehouses, where no other tobacco is made, thus assisting in the prevention of fraud, as we believe. The bill also remits the tax on distilled spirits used in making the tobacco exported under the same conditions and limitations as now remitted in case of some other articles made for export.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, in my previous remarks I omitted one essential statement. The provisions of this bill are very similar to, and almost identical with, the provisions of a bill reported to the Forty-eighth Congress. That bill was approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury of the last administration, as this bill is approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury of the present administration, showing that it is not complicated in its administration, that it is wise in its provisions, and that it encourages the export trade of our tobacco manufacturers.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] will allow me just one minute.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I think it is hardy proper for me as the exponent of the committee to stand here and allow their bill to be mutilitated in this sort of way. We do not know whether with these proposed amendments the bill will meet the concurrence of those who are to administer and enforce the law.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman will allow me just one minute.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman indicate to whom he yields?

Mr. HARRIS. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the bill?

Mr. MORRISON. The previous question has been moved on the bill and amendments, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for an amendment?

Mr. HARRIS. No, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let us have a division on ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 33.

So the previous question was ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. WISE'S amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 47.

Mr. MCADOO. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The hour under the rule has expired and the bill goes over, the pending question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order of business.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY, CHICAGO.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the demand for the regular order of business until I have an opportunity to ask unanimous consent in behalf of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to call up the bill (S. 1394) to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property.

Mr. MILLS. Has the other question been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The hour has expired, and the bill will come up in the next morning hour.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON]?

Mr. SWOPE. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. There are two or three gentlemen who were absent when their names were called, and if there be no objection their reports will be received.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

The DUNHAN. The bill referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] relates to a matter in the district I represent on this floor. Is it in order for me to know, Mr. Speaker, what member made objection to taking it up?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWOPE] objected.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWOPE] will withdraw his objection.

SAMUEL NOBLE.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. 7889) for the relief of Samuel Noble; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL-REVENUE SYSTEM.

Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 7549, a bill (H. R. 7890) to amend the internal-revenue system of legislation, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 7549 was laid on the table.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY, CHICAGO.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I appeal again to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWOPE] to withdraw his objection to calling up Senate bill 1394, to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property.

Mr. SWOPE. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not rise to object to the measure. The question is one of some importance, and I would suggest, if the bill be allowed to come before the House, some agreement should be reached by which twenty minutes' debate will be allowed upon it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I think a moment's explanation will satisfy every gentleman it is an entirely proper measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman agree to allow twenty minutes?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I am compelled to object. Let my friend from Illinois make a five-minute statement, reserving the right to object.

Mr. HOLMAN. It can go over until to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection to calling the bill up with that understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to that understanding.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. So far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned it is ready to go on with the consideration of that bill without any general debate whatever. I move, therefore, that the general debate be limited to one minute.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I make the point, as there has been no debate on the bill, the motion to close debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask by unanimous consent, as the copies have been exhausted, there be a reprint of the bill and accompanying report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. WILLIS moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. WELLBORN in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, it is not the desire of the committee to discuss this bill, except under the five-minute rule. I have, representing the committee, made a report showing the rivers and harbors for which appropriations are recommended, and the amounts allotted to each. That report has been printed, and is before the House. The total amount is $15,120,000; for harbors aggregating $4,000,000, and for rivers nine or ten millions of dollars. In other words, two-thirds of the bill is estimated for rivers and about one-third for harbors.

And now, Mr. Chairman, having made this brief statement, in order to obtain the sense of the House, reserving the balance of my time if it shall be necessary to use it, I move that the committee do now rise, indicating that my purpose is to submit a motion to limit the general debate.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 114, noes 12.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the river and harbor bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate upon the bill be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that it would be better to let the general debate run for a short time, at least, before submitting that motion.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, what length of time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. HISCOCK. I would suggest to the gentleman this, that I think it would facilitate the consideration of the bill if the gentleman would allow the general debate to go on and be exhausted. For my own part I do not think there will be any prolonged general debate. I think in all frankness that this should be done, so as not to let it appear at the outset as if it was an attempt on the part of the committee having charge of this bill to stifle debate. I repeat, in my opinion it would facilitate the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I will state to the gentleman from New York that there is no intention or desire on the part of the committee to shut off anybody from any reasonable opportunity of debating the bill. We have had no intimation, however, up to this time from anybody, except the objection made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], that any member of the House desired to discuss the bill, and consequently we thought it useless to exhaust the time of the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. Why not let the general debate run for a short time, and then see if there is any disposition to continue it? I do not think there is any disposition on the part of the opponents of the bill to take up any length of time.

Mr. WILLIS. I am sure of that; and if the gentleman will indicate some time when the debate, in his opinion, might be closed——

Mr. HISCOCK. I have suggested that it be allowed to run without limit for a while.

Mr. WILLIS. I will state that in consequence of the illness of several members of the committee and those on the other side of the House some members are necessarily absent, and of course the committee is somewhat embarrassed, and we have not felt called upon to indulge in any general debate, but thought it proper to ask the House to take up and consider the bill under the five-minute rule, which I think will give all of the debate required, because in that manner every paragraph of the bill will be subject to explanation and discussion.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no idea, as I have already said, who desires on this side of the House to speak for or against the bill; but for a bill carrying such a very large sum of money as this, it seems to me that the gentleman should go back into the committee and see what the disposition of the House is after debate has begun. And I say again that I believe there is no intention or purpose on the part of gentlemen, those who wish to discuss or criticise the bill, to embarrass its passage in any manner; but certainly ample time should be given for its consideration.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from New York is better versed in these matters than I am, in consequence of his long experience here; and as we have no intimation of a desire on the part of anybody to discuss the bill, I should be glad if he would suggest some time.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know that my experience has been longer than that of the gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. WILLIS. It has been better, at all events.

Mr. HISCOCK. And it is with a view to allowing the debate to continue for a while, and then to get an expression from the House as to the length of time, that I have made the suggestion to the gentleman from Kentucky. That being done, it will not look as if it was an attempt to stifle debate, and I am satisfied that we will make more rapid progress.

Mr. WILLIS. While I appreciate fully the grounds upon which the gentleman bases his suggestion, I would, in turn, suggest to him that many gentlemen are unwilling to be detained here by a general debate; and if there is to be a general debate, they will naturally want to know when it will terminate and when the bill is to be taken up for consideration. They will ask how long the general debate is to run, and I know, as the gentleman from New York is well aware, that there is always a desire, during the continuance of a prolonged general debate, on the part of gentlemen to absent themselves for convenience in attending to other business, for which the general debate offers the opportunity.

Mr. HISCOCK. I can only say to the gentleman from Kentucky that at the present time I am not advised of the name of a single gentleman who desires to make a speech upon the bill. I do not know that there is one. Likely, however, there may be; and, if so, the opportunity should be afforded to them. I repeat that in my opinion it would facilitate the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the object of general debate on such a bill is to give information to the House and country of the nature of the bill; and the object of continuing debate is to answer points and objections which may arise. It does seem to me unreasonable, before any debate has commenced, to limit the time, because until the subject begins to be discussed nobody can tell what is necessary to be said. Now, surely, the discussion of such a bill as this ought not to be an empty farce. It ought to grow naturally out of what is said at the commencement of the debate and during its continuance.

It ought to be such in its character as to satisfy the House that the items and the principle of the bill will commend themselves to the House and to the country.

Now, we ought not, if we are going to pass a bill like this, to have it followed by the usual tempest of misunderstanding which follows such a thing as this. It does appear to me the wisest course for the House, and the best thing for the country, is to give free rein to discussion within such limits as shall be made reasonable by the House after the commencement of the discussion.

What is the object of discussion except to bring out the points of the bill, to bring out the objections of members, and to afford an answer to them, if answer can be made, or to modify the bill if no answer can be made?

Mr. REAGAN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable, but the Chair has permitted these remarks to be made to see if an understanding can be arrived at.

Mr. REAGAN. The privilege of general debate is insisted on by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. For what purpose? They both avow they are not prepared to discuss this measure. They have no point to make against it. No one else has proposed to discuss it. Is the purpose simply to delay this House in its business and to show a Democratic House can not get through the public business? If that is it we had better understand it. If the object is to wear out time and delay public business, we had better understand it. The bill has been for a long time printed. It has been accessible to gentlemen, and if any desire to debate it they have the means of knowing its contents, and should be in a position to state their objections. But it is a different thing simply to beat about in the brush to see what objection can be raised against the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. The words of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] deserve some answer. I shall speak for myself, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Maine can speak for himself. I certainly have not sought to delay legislation at this session of Congress. The gentleman from Texas knows it, and this House knows it; neither by long speeches nor by making any speech when it was not a proper occasion, nor by any improper methods. And I desire to say further to the gentleman from Texas, that this side of the House has not sought on any occasion to delay the orderly, regular, systematic, energetic, carrying out of the policy of the House, if it have one. We have done nothing to produce delay, and if we are to have a long session of Congress, I desire to say to the gentleman from Texas here and now he need not advertise to the country that we on this side of the House are responsible for it.

Mr. WILLIS. Just one word. I accept the statement the gentleman from New York makes in perfect good faith. I do not believe for a single moment that any one purposely designs to delay this bill. That is my personal conviction, and I believe it is well founded. But we come here and no one has offered to debate the bill and a number of members of the committee are absent. If any suggestion in regard to the debate is to be made let us hear it and consider it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Does the gentleman from Kentucky mean to say that he proposes, with no explanation except what he can make in ten minutes, to present a bill of this sort to the House?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman from Maine, I have presented a report in which I have analyzed the bill from beginning to end. I have no idea the gentleman has done me the honor to read the report or that he will do so. But if he desires to know the contents of the bill he will read that report. But there is no wish on the part of any member of the committee to prevent any reasonable consideration of this bill; none whatever. Let gentlemen, however, indicate some time. If they will say two hours, I will change my motion and make it two hours; and I will say further on the part of the committee that gentlemen on that side can have three-fourths of that time. Is not that fair?

Mr. ANDERSON of Kansas. I will say so far as I am concerned that that is fair.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I modify my motion, and will say two hours.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And that this side of the House shall have three-quarters of that time?

Mr. WILLIS. I find as to that I have made a suggestion which my colleagues on the committee do not agree to. But I will change my motion so as to give the other side what amounts to three-fourths of the time, by making the whole time for general debate two and a half hours instead of two hours, with the understanding that if that length of time is not occupied in the general debate we will go ahead with the consideration of the bill by paragraphs.

The SPEAKER. The question of a division of the time is a matter of arrangement. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill; and pending that motion he moves that general debate be limited to two and a half hours.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill. By order of the House all general debate on this bill has been limited to two hours and a half. The Chair would inquire as to the arrangement touching the division of the time.

Mr. WILLIS. I will ask the Chair to stop me when I have occupied twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, in compliance with the wishes of my colleagues on the committee, I desire to call attention to the amount and character of the appropriations recommended in this bill. I will also very briefly submit one or two remarks of a general nature. I will not stop at this late day to discuss any supposed constitutional objection to this class of appropriations. There is no question now more fully settled than the right and duty of the Federal Government, within proper limitations of economy and public necessity, to regulate and to facilitate commerce by all appropriate public works.

While all political parties are agreed as to this, there are in both parties upright, patriotic, and honorable men who object to bills of this kind unless the amount appropriated is reasonable and the objects national in their character. Our committee submits this bill as one coming within the description I have just stated. We think that it calls for no more than is imperatively demanded by the commercial interests of the country, and we are fully persuaded that the most critical scrutiny will show that both the rivers and harbors which are enumerated are worthy of improvement and a public necessity.

Coming then briefly to the first objection, which is that bills of this character sometimes appropriate for objects that are not national in their character, I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole for a few minutes to an analysis of this bill in answer to that objection. The main divisions of the bill are of course between rivers and harbors. The amount recommended for harbors is $4,415,500, about one-third of the whole. Considerably more than one-half of that sum, or $2,705,000, is appropriated for fifteen harbors, the amounts therefor ranging from $100,000 to $435,000. The mention of those harbors will answer the question as to their national character. They are New York, Baltimore, Chicago, Toledo, Galveston, Cleveland, Mobile, and other harbors of equal importance and of like dignity.

There are eleven other harbors—such as Boston, Oswego, Milwaukee, Duluth, Erie, Oakland, &c.—the appropriations for which range from $50,000 to $95,000 each, aggregating $735,000. The appropriations for these twenty-six more important harbors aggregate $3,440,000; that is, over three-fourths of the whole amount are for harbors of the character which I have named and which are set forth in detail in the printed report accompanying this bill, and which I will print as a part of these remarks.

There are fifteen other harbors, the recommendations for which range in amount from $20,000 to $50,000 each, and which receive by this bill $420,000. The remaining harbors, eighty-one in number, receive $975,500.

Of river and channel items there are one hundred and sixty-five rivers and five channels recommended, amounting in the aggregate to $10,185,200, which is two-thirds of the whole bill. Of this amount, the Mississippi River from its headwaters to the passes receives $3,725,000, or over one-third of the whole. Sixteen other large rivers receive $3,831,500. Two channels, Hay Lake, in Michigan, and Saint John's, in Florida, receive $——. Adding these sixteen rivers and two channels to the Mississippi River we will have for seventeen great rivers and two channels $——, being nearly four-fifths of the amount recommended for such improvements. The national character of these rivers will be recognized from their names, Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, Illinois, Delaware, Red, James, &c. (page 2 of report), and next as to the aggregate amount of the bill. How does it compare with similar bills, and if larger, is its increase justifiable before the country?

The first appropriation of this kind was in 1802, for the Delaware River, which received the sum of $30,000. Since then Congress has, with one or two exceptions, voted similar appropriations every year. These river and harbor bills have annually increased in amount, and keeping pace, but not equal pace, with the increase of the wealth, commerce, and population of the country.

Thus we find for the year ending June 30, 1871, the sum of $3,445,900 was appropriated; for 1872, $4,407,500; for 1873, $5,588,000; for 1874, $6,102,900. Passing to the year 1879, we find $8,323,700; 1880, $9,577,495; 1881, $8,976,500 was appropriated; in 1882, $11,451,300; for the year ending June 30, 1883, which is the largest bill ever passed by any Congress, the amount was $18,988,875; for the year ending June 30, 1884, there was no appropriation. For 1885 the amount was $14,948,300; and for the year 1886—this year—there was no appropriation. Thus it will be seen that the river and harbor bill has gone from $5,228,000 in 1873, to $14,948,300, in 1885, being an average increase during the past ten years of one and a quarter millions per annum. This increase may seem great, but we must bear in mind that during an equal period of time—ten years—our population increased from 38,000,000 to 50,000,000.

During the same period of time the increase of exports and imports was $240,000,000. The increase of aggregate exports of leading articles in 1883 over 1873 was: Cotton raw, $20,000,000; cotton manufactures, $10,000,000 (or four times as great); flour, $34,000,000 (or three times as great); wheat, $68,000,000 (or two and one-half times as much); and of other articles, correspondingly. These figures give some idea of the enormous increase of production and its corresponding demand for transportation during this period of time.

It may be well, also, to compare the wonderful progress of the railroad system, upon whose exactions this system is intended to be a check. The railroad system began in this country in 1830, when 23 miles were built.

Between 1830 and 1850, 9,000 miles of road were built. To-day we have the grand total of 128,407 in actual operation, whose capitalization is seven and a half billions of dollars. Deducting one-half of this for depreciation, there will remain $4,000,000,000, as representing the present market value of the railroad system—a system which in 1884 transported over 300,000,000 passengers and 400,000,000 tons of freight. The total amount appropriated for rivers and harbors from the beginning of the Government, March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1886, is $144,546,008 as against $4,000,000,000. In other words, the railroads which have been constructed within the last thirty or forty years have cost over thirty times the total amount expended for rivers and harbors from the foundation of the Government.

I need not stop to add that the value of the lands granted to some of these railroads has been over five times the value of these appropriations. The expenditures, therefore, for these two rival systems bear no comparison with each other, either in aggregate amount or annual increase.

In determining what our own country should appropriate for its water ways, it may not be improper, Mr. Chairman, to consider what individual States and other nations have expended for similar purposes. Compare our expenditures with those of our commercial rival, England.

We have 23,000 miles of dangerous coast line on the oceans alone; England has only 1,300; yet in one year she expended in her harbors alone $15,000,000. Had we expended an amount proportionate to our coast line we would have appropriated the enormous sum of $270,000,000 for one year, and this would not have included one dollar for our thousands of miles of navigable rivers. Look further at the appropriations which England has made. Ten years ago I stood upon the banks of that wonderful river the Clyde. Converted from a shallow rivulet into a magnificent river, filled with the merchant vessels of every nation, it was at once an index and monument of England's wise statesmanship and commercial greatness.

Up to June 30, 1875, there had been expended on that single river over $30,000,000, a sum nearly as great as we have expended upon all our rivers and harbors from the foundation of the Government up to the same year. Upon the Mersey River the outstanding debt in 1882 was over $82,000,000. The breakwater at Portland cost $5,043,870; at Holyhead, $6,500,000; at Plymouth, $7,214,000. These constitute but a small portion of the expenditures in England alone, while in the various provinces the British Government has made most lavish outlays in the same direction. Canada, on the Welland Canal and its branches alone, has expended $45,115,000. In the same direction of cheaper transportation England expended in the East Indies, up to the end of the fiscal year 1882 and 1883, $125,000,000.

Not only this, but subsidizing certain railroads the British Government had expended $741,500,000. The State investment in railroads for the same purpose was $156,800,000, making a grand total, in round numbers, of $900,000,000. The Government and State loss on all railroads for twenty-four years—that is, from 1859 to 1883—was $124,725,000. In other words, England lost as much in twenty-four years in securing cheaper transportation in railroads alone nearly as much as we have expended altogether on our rivers and harbors for the same purpose. France has expended annually from fifteen to fifty millions of dollars, and yet the aggregate length of her water ways is not 7,000 miles, the cost of which has been over $400,000,000. Upon one of her harbors, that of Cherbourg, France has expended $100,000,000, or four times as much as our own Government has expended on all the great harbors of the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard and on the great lakes of the country.

Germany has just completed surveys for the improvement of her rivers and harbors and artificial water ways at an estimated cost of more than $100,000,000. She has also just built a ship-canal, connecting the Luebach Bay with the North Sea, thereby reducing the transportation on wheat 6 cents a bushel. Russia has just completed water ways connecting the Volga and the Don at an enormous expense, which will save in transportation 7 cents a bushel on wheat. It must be borne in mind also, as has been well said by the very intelligent gentleman, Mr. Dore, of Chicago, in presenting these statistics to the committee, that we should consider also the burdens under which these countries labor, their great standing armies, their large navies, their immense national debts.

France, with more than 500,000 soldiers in her standing army, 302 ships of war, and 40,000 marines, at an annual expense of $160,000,000, and a public debt of within a fraction of $6,000,000,000, three times the amount our national debt ever was, is not embarrassed, though having only a population of 37,000,000. Germany has a standing army of 445,000 men, supported at an annual expense of $85,000,000, 91 men-of-war, and 15,000 seamen, at a cost of $7,000,000, making a total of $92,000,000—population 45,000,000. Great Britain has a standing army of 181,000, costing $90,000,000 per annum, a navy of 246 vessels, with 57,000 men, costing $53,000,000; total cost of her army and navy, $140,000,000 annually. Her public debt is more than three and a half billions, and population 35,000,000. These are the nations which compete with the United States for the trade of the world.

The United States has an army of 26,000, costing $40,000,000, and a navy—largely on paper—of 93 so-called men-of-war, costing $17,000,000. Total cost of our Army and Navy, $57,000,000; population, 60,000,000. Upon these facts, to secure that cheap transportation without which competition with these nations, as I shall presently show, is useless, will it be thought extravagant, unwise, unbusiness-like to appropriate fifteen or sixteen millions of dollars for these great national works of the Federal Union?

The present bill appropriates a total amount of $15,120,700, which is within $52,000 of the last bill making appropriations of this character. That bill, like this, appropriates just 33⅓ per cent. of the estimates. The bill of the Forty-seventh Congress appropriated 56⅓ per cent. of the estimates. The estimates upon which the present bill is founded call for $42,332,100. In addition to the regular engineers' estimates, there were before the committee special reports for new improvements and new projects for old improvements calling for over $20,000,000 additional. The total demand upon the committee was therefore in round numbers $60,000,000. The amount allowed of this total is, as just stated, $15,000,000, or 25 per cent. thereof.

I submit, therefore, Mr. Chairman, in view of the immense amounts expended by our rivals and competitors in trade, in view of the rapid and enormous extension of the railway system and of the larger demands of our increased population and commerce, that the amount asked for in this bill is reasonable and proper.

Another and equally important fact to be borne in mind in this connection is that Congress failed to pass a river and harbor bill last year. For the present fiscal year, therefore, ending the 30th of next June, not one dollar was appropriated. It will be remembered that, while the first bill presented by this committee in the last session of the last Congress, appropriating twelve millions, met with opposition, a substitute appropriating five million was passed with practical unanimity. This was the very smallest amount which in the judgment of that Congress could with propriety be appropriated.

The committee which presents this bill has therefore been compelled to appropriate for two fiscal years.

THEORY OF THE BILL.

One of the criticisms usually and easily made upon river and harbor bills is what may be called the geographical criticism. I do not know that any gentleman will feel called upon to attack this bill in that way. I do know, however, that such an attack, if made, is utterly without foundation. I state here, what every member of the committee will confirm, that the question of State lines or district lines was never either directly or indirectly considered in the formation of this bill. For myself I declare now that I could not come within a hundred thousand dollars of stating the amount that any given State in the Union has received under this bill.

I venture to say that no member of our committee, unless his attention has been called to it since the bill was reported, could make any better guess than I have upon that subject. The single proposition upon which we have acted in recommending these appropriations has been the necessities of commerce. We have not stopped to inquire in what State or district a harbor or river was located. If it needed aid and the facts warranted our action we have given it, and given it as fully as the limits of a prudent bill would admit. We have unanimously regarded this bill as a bill for the execution under the Constitution of great national instrumentalities of commerce among the several States, and not as a bill of distributions, as of a dead man's estate among his heirs. The locality of the particular harbor or the particular river was of no consequence whatever.

Where the need was, where the disease was, there we have applied the remedy, whether it was in the North or South, the East or West, whether in a Territory or in a State, whether it was in a State with a half-dozen votes on the floor, as the great metropolis of New York, or in a State with only one, as the State of Oregon. It is true that some States, like Michigan, have an immense coast line, being 15 per cent. of the whole Union. The demands of commerce are greater, therefore, than in a land-locked State, like Kansas or Colorado. The internal commerce of Michigan is over one-half of the whole United States.

Will any member of Kansas be so unreasonable as to complain that Michigan with its immense coast line has received a greater per cent., if you please, in this bill than his own State? As well might he complain of any other one of the great appropriation bills of this House. Comparing his own State in these appropriation bills with that of Massachusetts, for instance, or Maine, he might criticise and refuse to vote to appropriate for life-saving stations, for light-houses, or fortifications, complaining that Congress had discriminated in favor of these States and against his people. The ready and complete answer to such an unreasonable and unjust complaint would be that the subject-matters of the bill were not included in the territorial limits of his State.

Proceeding upon this theory, ignoring State lines and State boundaries, and considering only the demands of commerce at each point, we took the reports of the engineers as the foundation of our examination, carefully investigated all the facts with reference to each harbor and each river in the country. We examined the original plans and estimates to find out how far they had been accomplished, and the total amount appropriated therefor; we took into consideration the amount of money on hand at the beginning of the fiscal year; and, finally, we inquired into the commercial statistics of the place, because we recognized the fact that a harbor which sheltered a thousand vessels was ten times more important than the harbor which sheltered a hundred, and that the river that bore upon its bosom the commerce of $20,000,000 was twenty times more important, the necessity for improvement being the same, than the river which bore a commerce of $1,000,000 in value. Thus availing ourselves of the reports of the engineers and of official documents, we invited and welcomed any supplementary information from any source whatever, whether oral or documentary.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, our committee—and when I say committee I mean all of them, because we referred none of these subjects to a subcommittee—our committee, as an entirety, sitting as a jury, if you please, heard all the testimony and rendered our verdict upon each proposition incorporated in the bill upon the specific and detailed facts presented in reference to it. We therefore laid down for ourselves no cast-iron rule; we were not bound by any regular per cent. In some instances, like that at the Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee River, we gave the full amount asked by the engineer for the completion of the work, and it was a large amount; but the committee were unanimously of the opinion that in an improvement which was so national in its character, and which had been pending since 1830, in which the Government had invested an immense sum of money, and where no benefit whatever could result until the work was open, we thought it wise economy and good business sense to make this investment return something as speedily as possible. There are other instances of a similar character, but I allude to this as being one of the most noted and most important.

And permit me to say further, and to challenge contradiction from any source, whether in the committee or out of the committee, that so far as this bill is concerned the charge so usually bandied about in regard to river and harbor bills, that they are matters of chance, industry, and push—that many appropriations are put in by reason of the activity and perseverance and zeal of members, whether represented in committee or elsewhere—such a charge is not sustained by any fact within my knowledge or the knowledge of my colleagues on the committee. We heard all and treated all with equal and exact justice.

INCIDENTAL PRESENT BENEFITS OF THE BILL.

It may not be improper, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to the present condition of the country and to the urgent demand for employment by hundreds of thousands of worthy men, not as a reason for the passage of this bill, but as one of the many benefits which will result from its passage. I repudiate as fully as any gentleman upon this floor the idea that this is a paternal government. I deny that it is either our duty or our right under the Constitution to take the taxes drawn from all classes of the people and distribute them as a charity or to afford employment to anybody who is in necessity in the country. The Federal Government is not an eleemosynary institution. It is not and ought not to become the common almoner for all who are in want.

I do not believe that our Government, imitating France under the first Napoleon, should inaugurate great works of public improvement simply for the purpose of giving employment to those who can not find employment elsewhere. The cry of "panem et circenses" is the cry of imperial Rome, and not of republican, democratic America. But while holding to these doctrines shall we shut our eyes to the terrible facts which environ us? Poverty and want stalk abroad; the fires in our furnaces have been extinguished; many of the largest manufactories in the land have shut down; capital shrinks from investment, and labor is unemployed.

Under these circumstances will any one regret, will we not rather greatly rejoice, if this Federal Congress in the exercise of its legal and constitutional functions, building up and completing these great harbors whose outstretched arms and sheltering wings receive and protect the commerce of our people from storm and from ruin; widening and deepening these majestic rivers through whose veins pours the life-blood of our trade—shall we not gladly welcome the fact that while accomplishing these beneficent and necessary results we at the same time are furnishing employment to the millions of worthy workingmen, giving bread to their hungry children, and putting again life and hope and happiness in the darkened homes of poverty throughout the land?

Not, therefore, as an object, but as one of the results of these appropriations, seldom in the history of our country will the passage of a river and harbor bill, in my judgment, meet with a heartier support and warmer welcome than now. Certainly no one will regret if the Federal Government, which so often goes to the people as a tax-gatherer, enforcing its laws and collecting its revenue, to the oppression and hardship frequently of its people—no one will regret that that Federal Government should occasionally, at least, present itself to that people as in this bill in acts of beneficence, returning its exactions as the heavens return the moisture gathered from the earth, to the accommodation, benefit, and happiness of those from whom they were made.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is unnecessary to call attention to the urgency and commercial importance of this class of appropriations. If there was any doubt upon these questions it would be answered by the facts of the past year. We have had pending before the American people during that time many great public questions affecting their honor, their prosperity, and their happiness. The restoration and rehabilitation of our Navy, the adjustment of our external and internal taxes, the further or the free coinage of silver—these and many other questions have occupied and agitated the public mind. But in no one of them has the interest been as great as in the subject of cheaper transportation, involved in the improvement of the rivers and harbors of our country; in no one of them has public interest been sufficient to call together a large convention of even one State or Territory of this Union.

While upon this subject of the improvement of our water ways there has been not one but five largely attended conventions, representing more than half the people of the United States and more than two-thirds of its productive energies.

I have before me the reports of those conventions, at Saint Paul, at New Orleans, at Kansas City, and if any gentleman doubts the fact that our people are in earnest about this matter, let him read the declarations that have gone forth from those great conventions and he will see that the people of the United States are terribly in earnest upon this question of cheap transportation. And, sir, why should they not be? Do we not see yonder in England a movement for the opening of the Suez Canal which has brought directly in contact with the markets of England the cheap products of her great colony of India? Do we not see in Germany and in France the deepening of their rivers and the widening of their harbors and a general effort in the direction of securing competition with the United States? How are we to meet that competition? How, except by widening our rivers and by deepening our harbors, so that vessels of larger draught may pass through them, thus cheapening transportation and laying down the products of the teeming West in the seaports upon our Atlantic coast and in the markets of Europe at 15 or 20 cents per bushel less than they now cost? I have already occupied more time than I had intended, so I will not stop now to read the statistics, but I will incorporate in my remarks the figures showing the great decrease that has taken place in the cereal exports of this country.

Those exports are from sixty to eighty million dollars less to-day than they were this day a year ago. And your people, my friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], are more deeply interested in this question than mine or than those who reside upon the Atlantic coast, because your people are shut in by land, bound up by railroad monopolies, and unless you can offset those disadvantages, unless you can prevent the exactions of those monopolies you are, as you know, their slave, and every foot of land within the territorial limits of your State is mortgaged by their power.

Mr. Chairman, I can not close without expressing to the House, and to each individual member of it that appeared before our committee, my own thanks and the thanks of members of the committee for the courteous way in which they treated us, and we have endeavored, in reciprocation of that treatment, to be just and correct in our dealing with the subject committed to us by the House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. What disposition does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] desire to make of his remaining time—twenty-eight minutes?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield now to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES], if he desires to go on. If not, I reserve the time.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Unless it is agreeable to some one who wishes to oppose the bill——

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman from Alabama desires to go on now the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] in his own right.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my concurrence in what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has just said in regard to the desirability of regulating railways by cheapening transportation through the opening of the water ways. Upon that there can be little difference of opinion, I fancy, among those who live in the interior; and, as for myself, no one will recognize more fully the effect which water navigation must in the nature of things have upon railway transportation. It is for that reason that I heartily favor the development of any water way, whether it be by river or by canal, which will have the result of giving to the people of the West, to those growing grain and raising stock, cheaper outlets than are now afforded by pooled railways.

But, Mr. Chairman, while men agree upon a priniciple, whether it be a principle of law or of theology, it happens often that there is a question about the application of that principle. I shake hands heartily with my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] upon the proposition which he has enunciated with respect to the effect of water navigation upon railway transportation, and just because of the thoroughness of my belief in that proposition I have some little difference of opinion with the gentlemen who have framed this bill as to the application which they have made of the principle.

For instance, take the Mississippi River, upon which the central States of the continent will some day largely depend for transportation—I say central, because Kansas is the geographical center of the continent—that river in the future will undoubtedly be of immense value to the whole Missouri River basin. No one can doubt that; and if it were to-day an original question as to whether you should by an appropriation create the Mississippi River or not have it, I certainly would vote to have it.

But, Mr. Chairman, when the Great Architect planned and framed this continent, with wondrous foresight and with infinite sagacity throwing that stream up toward the lakes, throwing the lakes back from the Atlantic, providing by His own grand act those superb water ways, and indicating the future lines of cheap transportation when there shall be a hundred millions or two hundred millions of people upon this continent, one-half of whom will be west of the Mississippi River—when He did that, I recognize that He did something which may perhaps render unnecessary such large appropriations for the Mississippi River as are annually recommended by the Committee on Commerce.

And when He made the broad channel in that river, when He deepened it, when by the snows from the mountains and the rainfalls everywhere in the great basin he furnished the water to wash out that channel, I fancy He did something that might perhaps save the Government of the United States from the necessity of making appropriations to develop the levee system on the Mississippi River. In other words, I do not think the boats will run on the levees, and I do not think the levees will have any material effect either in deepening or preserving the channel.

I recognize, too, another fact—that for centuries before the white race had set foot on this continent the Mississippi River proper was a navigable stream, and is to-day a navigable stream in the sense that it is practically capable of carrying large steamers with large cargoes.

Mr. VAN EATON. I would like to know whether the gentleman meant to say that the Mississippi carried steamers centuries before the white man came here. [Laughter.] I understood him to say so.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am very much obliged to my friend for calling my attention to that point. If I have made any such statement, I withdraw it out of respect to my friend.

Mr. VAN EATON. I just "wanted to know, you know."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No doubt it would be a mistake to say that there were steamers on the Mississippi before the white man came to this country; but as to there being water in this river sufficient to float steamers before the white man came here, that is not a mistake.

Mr. VAN EATON. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Well, by logic.

Mr. VAN EATON. I just "wanted to know, you know." [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I think that could be proven without much trouble.

Now, the question arises, in my mind at least, whether it is necessary in a bill appropriating in the aggregate $15,000,000 to make an appropriation of $3,600,000 for the Mississippi River; and while, as I said, no one on this floor is more ready than myself to favor anything which will cheapen railroad transportation by developing water transportation, yet, when I come to apply that proposition to the Mississippi River, I feel that this bill proposes to give a great deal too much for that river. In a bill appropriating $15,000,000 to the whole continent it seems to me an appropriation of $3,600,000 for the Mississippi River, less than one-fifth of the total, is altogether too much, when, in fact, the Mississippi River to-day will carry all the vessels needed to transport your freight.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. If there are obstructions in the Mississippi River—if there be any points which should be deepened or protected in order to secure navigation—I am willing to vote liberal appropriations for that purpose; but I wish to know beforehand whether the proposed scheme will be effectual—whether if you expend $50,000,000 or $500,000,000 in this form of improvement there will be any improvement there at the end of five years from the termination of the expenditure. And I am frank to say, Mr. Chairman, that I regard the utility of the present expenditures for the deepening of the channel of the Mississippi River as, to say the least, exceedingly problematical. I should be inclined to go further, and say that I regard such expenditures very much in the same way as if some one should attempt to fill a rat-hole by pouring water in it.

Mr. VAN EATON. I will state to the gentleman that I have very often filled a rat-hole by pouring water in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Well, I am happy to know that my friend has been successful in that respect—more successful than he has been in some other things sometimes.

Now, there is another stream which concerns especially the States of Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and a large group of States constituting, if not the finest, certainly as fertile and productive a grain region as there is upon the continent, and to this stream the committee has seen fit to pay very little attention. I find that the total appropriations for the Missouri River are $500,000 from the mouth to Sioux City, $80,000 from Sioux City to Fort Benton, and $30,000 for the removal of obstructions, making a total of $610,000. Compare this with the total of $3,630,000 for the Mississippi River, and it seems to me there is, to say the least, a lack of symmetry in the bill; because the Missouri River, if thoroughly developed and utilized, would furnish water transportation in competition with railways for a section of country that is more populous and raises larger crops than that of the Lower Mississippi.

Another defect in the bill is this: There are points along that river—for instance, Atchison and Leavenworth in my own State, Kansas City and Saint Joseph in Missouri, where there are populous and enterprising cities and where the banks are in danger of washing away. While no one of these points is in my district, yet I understand that my colleague from the first district [Mr. MORRILL] asked that a specific appropriation be made for Leavenworth and Atchison; and I think the gentlemen representing the districts in which Saint Joseph and Kansas City are located made similar applications. They were declined; and there are no specific appropriations in this bill, it being assumed by the committee that these points will be provided for out of the aggregate half million appropriation. Why the committee has reached that conclusion I do not know; probably because of some general rule, and as to many rivers they have evidently followed it, but there are several rivers to which the rule has not been applied.

I read:

Improving Saginaw River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $45,000; of which $22,500 are to be used opposite Bay City.

Here is a specific appropriation. Also—

Improving Wabash River, Indiana and Illinois——

Mr. WILLIS. My friend from Kansas will permit me to call attention to the fact that in the last Congress he, with his colleagues and other Representatives from the Upper Missouri, requested the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to create a Missouri River commission and put the river under that commission, and yielding to their better judgment, although against the judgment of the committee, they created that commission. Therefore nothing specific is asked by this bill. At the Saginaw River there is no commission, and hence the committee is at liberty to make specific appropriation.

Mr. PETERS. Is not there a Mississippi River commission, and why not treat the Missouri as the Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIS. There is a specific recommendation on the part of the Mississippi River Commission for the improvement the gentleman refers to, and that is the only difference. There was no desire on the part of the committee, I will say to the gentleman, to do more than adhere to the commission of your own creation.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. So far as that is concerned I think when Congress creates a commission the House does not part with its right to designate specific points at which expenditures shall be made.

I do not know whether the Illinois River is under the authority of a commission or not, but at any rate here is a specific appropriation:

Improving Illinois River, Illinois: Continuing improvement, $100,000; of which sum $5,000 may be expended in dredging the river in front of Peoria.

Here is another one for the improvement of the Ohio River. Is that in charge of a commission?

Improving the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $500,000; out of which sum $50,000 are to be expended at Grand Chain in extending the upper dike downstream and removing rocks and other obstructions to navigation at that locality; also $20,000 may be expended in constructing or aiding in the construction of such an embankment on the other side of the Great Miami River, near its junction with the Ohio, as may be necessary to confine the waters of the Great Miami in great floods to the general course of its channel at or near the Ohio, to the end that the formation of the bar in the Ohio River now forming and obstructing navigation may be arrested; also $30,000 of said appropriation shall be expended in constructing four ice-piers, pursuant to the plans of the Chief of Engineers, at or near the following places to wit: One at Pomeroy, Ohio; one at Middleport, Ohio; one at Gallipolis, Ohio; and one at Ironton, Ohio.

Here is our venerable friend again Davis Island Dam.

Also out of said appropriation for the Ohio River $5,865 shall be used in operating and keeping in repair the Davis Island Dam; and hereafter the Secretary of War is authorized to make requsitions from time to time on the Secretary of the Treasury for such sums as may be necessary to operate and keep in repair the works at the Davis Island Dam, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Here is the Mississippi River. That I believe is under a commission.

Improving Mississippi River from Saint Paul to Des Moines Rapids: Continuing improvement, $510,000; of which sum $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to the removal of the rock at Duck Creek Chain, at the Rock Island Rapids.

Mr. MURPHY. The Mississippi River Commission only extends up to Saint Louis.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am obliged to the gentleman for the information. My point is that whether a stream be under the charge of a commission or not, it is within the province of this House to say that a specific sum shall be expended at given points.

Here is an appropriation for dry-dock at Des Moines Rapids, $65,000.

Then we have another, which I will read:

Improving Mississippi River from Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois River, including the river at Quincy Bay and the removal of the bar at the mouth of Whipple Creek; including also the strengthening of Sny Island Levee where it crosses Snicarte Slough, and other sloughs referred to in the report of Engineer Maj. A. Mackenzie, dated the 26th of January, 1885, which work of strengthening said levee shall be performed according to the suggestions and estimates of said Mackenzie, as set forth in said report: Continuing improvement, $200,000: Provided, That not more than $16,500 shall be expended at Sny Island Levee.

Here is another:

Improving the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois River to the mouth of the Ohio River, including the completion of the work at Alton, and, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, the protection of the Illinois shore opposite the mouth of the Missouri River: Continuing improvement, $500,000; of which $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended in extending the work for the protection of the eastwardly bank of the Mississippi River at Cairo, and the prevention of its wash or erosion, commencing at the southerly end of the present Government revetment work and continuing downstream; and the river commission may, in their discretion, use so much of said sum of $500,000 as may be necessary to correct the current of the river and improve the channel at Saint Louis.

This latter is a point covered by the Mississippi River Commission. I think the appropriation is wise, and that the channel abreast such a city as Saint Louis ought to be improved, and I hold that this House has the right to say there should be specific appropriation at that point. That being so, Mr. Chairman, I do not see why there should not be specific appropriations for Kansas City, Leavenworth, Atchison, and Saint Jo.

Here in the Lower Mississippi we have an appropriation of—

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the rectification of the Red and Atchafalaya Rivers by preventing further enlargement of the latter stream and restricting its outlet capacity, and for keeping open a navigable channel through the mouth of Red or Old River into the Mississippi.

Then—

One hundred thousand dollars in deepening the channel at Vicksburg by dredging through the bar existing there; but this last-named sum shall not be expended, unless after another examination or survey the commission shall deem it advisable; and if they shall not, then $50,000 shall be expended in the improvement of navigation at Vicksburg by constructing suitable dikes and other appropriate works.

The only point I wish to make by reading these items, Mr. Chairman, is that the committee has in many instances made specific appropriations where there is a commission and where there is not a commission, and I do not see why there should not be specific appropriations where they are needed upon the Missouri River.

I have no desire in the world to make any factious opposition to this bill. I have not had time to examine it, even to read it, until this morning. My point is that you have given too little to the Missouri River. Representing as I do in part that region of the country, looking to the importance of that stream, I wish frankly to say that if $600,000 be considered enough for the Missouri River improvement I certainly shall not vote and can not vote for $3,610,000 for the Mississippi River.

You see this money comes from the people of the United States. It should be expended, and I doubt not the committee desire it should be expended, for the benefit of the people of the United States in a broad, true sense, in an effective sense; and, looking at the present densities of population, looking at the relative industries and products of sections, looking at the value of water navigation to the people of the West, I certainly feel, and I think the gentlemen representing that region all along the Missouri River will feel, justified first in criticising this bill, and second in expressing themselves in opposition to an appropriation of $3,610,000 for the Mississippi River. I do not think it is a fair divide. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit a question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. With pleasure.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is a fact—I make the statement—it is a fact that the amount appropriated in this bill for the Missouri River is greater in proportion, according to the estimates of the engineers, than that included in the bill for the Mississippi River. Is the gentleman aware of that fact?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am obliged to my friend from Louisiana, but he has much too high an opinion of the estimates of the engineers for me. His opinion is very much higher than mine.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is the estimate of the commission.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The engineers make their estimates for a specific point at which they have made their examination and surveys. I do not undertake to criticise their work in that respect, or criticise them in any manner in the sense that there is not a proper discharge of their duties. But I stand here representing a State with a large interest in cheap transportation upon an entirely different standpoint from that occupied by the engineers, and from this point I insist again that the appropriation for the Mississippi River is altogether too large if the appropriation for the Missouri River is a proper one.

I yield the remainder of my time——

Mr. VAN EATON. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit a question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Oh, yes.

Mr. VAN EATON. If I understand the gentleman from Kansas, his point is that the Mississippi River appropriation is entirely too large.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN EATON. Do I understand the gentleman from Kansas to contend that upon the principles of hydraulics you can not fill a rathole with water? [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have some objections to some of the features of this bill. I have no objection to a limited expenditure for the improvement of rivers and harbors—improvements that can and ought to be made; but I have very great objection to some of the wasteful features of this bill. I believe that some of its appropriations are without any justification or without any warrant whatever; that they are simply a prodigal, wasteful throwing away of the people's money. I find in this bill appropriations for works, without any change in the character of the work, without any proposition whatever to modify the plans of the engineers who are conducting the work, and without even a recommendation of a change, although a year ago gentlemen, then and now interested, were denouncing upon this floor these plans as leading to unwarranted extravagance.

Let me call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the appropriation that is asked for the improvement of Galveston Harbor. Last year, in the discussion of the bill, gentlemen representing that city and other gentlemen representing the State of Texas declared here that there was no possibility of accomplishing good by the continuation of the plans then adopted by the board of engineers. They were loud and lusty in their denunciation of the work.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Do you not know that this appropriation is made under new recommendations and new plans of the engineers, and that a survey has been completed of Galveston Harbor, under which survey and the recommendation thereon by the Chief of Engineers this appropriation is made?

Mr. HEPBURN. Will you tell me the difference between the plan now and what was contemplated at that time?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. There is a considerable difference. One difference is that at that time they were using brush for revetments. Now they propose to use stone. That is one of the changes, and of course it necessarily involves a greater expenditure, but the work is more permanent. I want to say further that another change is in the lines of the jetties; that they are placed nearer together under this plan than they were before.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will you tell me how much nearer?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Several hundred feet. I have sent for the report. I think it is six or eight hundred feet.

Mr. HEPBURN. Last year the objection was not that brush was being used; but it was claimed then that these jetties were 3,000 feet apart; that they were so wide that there was no possibility of securing the scouring process and no possibility of the deepening of the channel. And gentlemen told us there was loss of water on the bar after the expenditure of millions of dollars—less of water on the bar than when the improvement was begun. And they read to us here from reports to show conclusively—and they were able to do it—that those statements were correct.

Not only that, but the gentleman representing the city of Galveston himself moved to strike out of the bill an appropriation of $250,000 for that work, saying, as he did so, that it was a waste of public money. Then gentlemen wanted seven and a half millions of dollars for this improvement. Are we to understand, and will the chairman of the committee state whether new plans have been adopted at Galveston in accordance with the scheme that was then upon the tapis, and that is to cost seven and a half millions of dollars by estimate and twenty-five millions in fact?

Mr. WILLIS. There is no such plan pending in Congress. There is a new plan, which lessens the width.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it substantially the plan of Mr. Eads?

Mr. WILLIS. Not at all; and the gentleman will understand me when I say it is just the reverse. It is a plan of the United States engineers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Substantially the plan originally adopted, only slightly narrowing the channel——

Mr. WILLIS. There is that much of difference; the only objection to the original plan was the width.

Mr. HEPBURN. And changing from brush to stone.

Mr. Chairman, I find another appropriation here, an appropriation of more than $2,000,000, for the improvement of the Mississippi River. And yet the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]—and there is no one in this House, in my judgment, who is better informed on the subject of the Mississippi River improvement or knows more about it theoretically or practically—that gentleman last year told us that the plan upon which the commission was then at work was an absolute and total failure. The gentleman from Arkansas then told us that there was an absolute necessity for an immediate and entire change of the whole programme if benefit was to result from the expenditure of these large sums. Is there any change of the plans of the commission? Have they in any manner modified their views with regard to this great work? Are they not conducting the work now precisely as they proposed to do in their first plan submitted to Congress, namely, the building of levees, the revetment of the banks, and the narrowing of the channels for the purpose of scouring out the bottom of the river—the same plans that they were working upon last year, that the gentleman from Arkansas told us were to result in absolute failure and to make this appropriation a wasteful and prodigal expenditure of the public money?

I have no hostility, Mr. Chairman, to the improvement of the Mississippi River. I believe that its navigation ought to be improved. I have no faith in the pretense that it is an improvement of the navigation of that great river that these expenditures are for. Strike out of this appropriation and of the plan of the commission the levee feature, and in my humble judgment there is no gentleman from the Lower Mississippi River that will raise his hand to secure an appropriation.

Will you remember, sir, with what tenacity these gentlemen have clung upon all occasions to retaining the power upon the part of the commission to build the levees? And it seems to me that sometimes they have acted with something else than fairness and ingenuousness in their efforts to secure a continuation of that power. Let me call your attention to a clause of this bill. On page 47, I read this proviso:

That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands by overflow.

That would seem to be a very proper provision. What right has the planter of Louisiana or the planter of Mississippi to demand that his private estate shall be protected; that it shall be enhanced in value at the cost of the Government? What right have you of Louisiana to tax the people of Iowa in order to raise your lands above the point of overflow? No one that I know of would have any objection to these lands being the most fertile of the earth; but we do not want their fertility purchased out of our pockets. There is difficulty in that region, and I recognize it.

In the old days and under the old system of labor each plantation was provided with watchful guardians of the levees. There was always a force there instantly to repair the first break in the levee. But it is not so now. I am told that the laborers there are unwilling to devote their energies and their time to the rebuilding of the levees or watching them. There must be some other power, some other authority for this purpose, and in my humble judgment the gentlemen who are the proponents of this measure have discovered in the Mississippi River Commission the watchful guardians that are constantly to look after and care for and rebuild when necessary the levees of that country that make it of value. I want to call your attention a little further to a second proviso which I find on the same page:

Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to pay and build levees, if in their judgment it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river, and to deepen the channel.

Why, gentlemen, every member of that committee knew that the Mississippi River Commission had declared that the building of levees was absolutely essential to their plan of improving the river, and when they put in the first provision prohibiting the commission from building levees and couple it with this other, it is the merest pretense of fairness. It is an attempt, it seems to me, to throw men off their guard to pretend to say that the public money shall not be expended in the building of levees for private uses, and yet to say that it shall be, because the commission have said that they deem it necessary to build them in order to improve the navigation.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the language which he has just read has been used in every appropriation made by Congress for the Mississippi River from the time of the formation of the commission in 1879 down to the present time.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know that it has been in every one.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It has.

Mr. HEPBURN. I know that there has been a vigorous effort made to strike it out of some of them, and I know that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], while protesting all the time that the purpose was not to build levees, has been one of those who have insisted most strenuously upon keeping this ambiguous and disengenuous language in the law.

Mr. BLANCHARD. And the gentleman will do me the justice to state that I have never contended for the construction of levees at all except as a part of the plan of the commission for the improvement of the river.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is just what I am complaining of, Mr. Chairman. I remember that last year the gentleman wanted $200,000 to be carved out of the appropriations for the purpose of improving and perfecting the harbor of the city of New Orleans; in other words, to riprap one of the levees of the Mississippi River.

Mr. BLANCHARD. When the gentleman makes a statement of that sort he will surely allow me to correct him.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Well, the gentleman from Louisiana did not do anything of the sort.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will appeal to the record. I will not dispute with the gentleman.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors made an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of New Orleans under plans submitted by the commission separate and apart from the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HEPBURN. What was the improvement?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is stated there in the report.

Mr. HEPBURN. It was the riprapping of the levees of the river.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Not at all. It had nothing to do with the levees of the river.

Mr. HEPBURN. What harbor is there there, except the levees?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was the improvement of the harbor where the ships anchor; the levees are on the bank.

Mr. HEPBURN. They come right to the bank, do they not?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was the anchorage-ground of the city of New Orleans.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well. I think we are both talking about the same thing. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that there are improvements that are needed upon the Mississippi River, for in certain stages of low water there are several bars, perhaps twenty in all, from Saint Louis down, that inconvenience and sometimes interrupt the navigation of the river, and I would be perfectly willing that expenditure should be made for the purpose of rectifying those difficulties. They are local in their nature; they could be easily removed, it seems to me, and I would have no objection to the expenditure of a reasonable sum of money for that purpose; but I have been told, and I believe there is an abundance of authority for the assertion, that the contemplated improvement by the commission will cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

If any gentleman is doubtful with regard to that proposition, I refer him to the testimony that was taken by a special committee of this House about two years since; I refer him to the reports of some of the members of the commission—the disagreeing reports; I refer him to the entire absence, on the part of any one who is authorized to speak or who is supposed to understand the subject, of a contradiction of the statements that have been made from time to time of the immense cost of this improvement.

Mr. Chairman, I am not satisfied that this improvement will be of the transcendent benefit that some people seem to think it will. I remember being at one of the great river conventions in the city of Saint Louis, of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] spoke a while ago. He was a guest of the city of Saint Louis at that time, and he will remember that the members of the convention were invited to take a trip on one of those splendid barge vessels and tows with which they navigate that river.

We went some twenty miles down the river. There were pointed out to us nearly a hundred of these large barges and twenty or thirty powerful steamers that propelled them tied to the bank of the river. Yet the river was then at flood. On that very morning there was published in the papers of Saint Louis a notice to all the agents of the railroads not to ship any grain to that city, that all the elevators were full, and that two thousand cars were standing upon the track waiting to be unloaded. Here were millions of bushels of freight seeking a market; here was the river with twenty or more feet of water on every bar from Saint Louis to New Orleans; here were a hundred of these barges and twenty or more steamers tied in idleness to the bank. There was no freight for New Orleans. It was not the direction this grain was seeking. There was no demand for the river, improved or unimproved. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] will remember the incident. What was the reason of that? Simply because at the city of New Orleans there are no vessels beyond those needed for the transportation of cotton that can be cheaply laden to Liverpool with grain.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the gentleman will allow me a moment I will refute his statement that that is not the direction the grain takes. I desire to read some official statistics showing the grain shipments from New Orleans.

Mr. HEPBURN. You can do that after I am through.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Not for that purpose. I know what I am talking about, because I witnessed the incident I have stated. The gentleman from Kentucky was there with me at the time, and he knows the truthfulness of my statement. I am perfectly willing to yield for a contradiction from the gentleman from Kentucky if he is disposed to make it.

Mr. WILLIS. I have no recollection of the circumstance; but I implicitly believe the statement which the gentleman makes.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to make one statement?

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not yield for a statement; I will yield for a question.

Mr. KING. Then I will ask a question. Does the gentleman mean to state that there were no ships at New Orleans to carry the grain?

Mr. HEPBURN. I say there is no such excess of transportation at the city of New Orleans as to produce the low rates which we obtain from New York to Liverpool.

Mr. KING. I simply wish to say that ships can and will come to New Orleans for just as much grain as will be delivered for shipment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Undoubtedly; but they will charge full rates; while at New York vessels are competing for this freight; they frequently take grain as ballast; and there have been shipments of it from Chicago to Liverpool at 10 cents a bushel.

These are some of the reasons, Mr. Chairman, why I do not want to vote for these extravagant appropriations. There is no proportion between the results accomplished and the expenses.

I remember, Mr. Chairman, I was able at one time to call the attention of the House to the Blue Book, in which I found the names of such a number of employés of the Mississippi River Commission above the grade of laborers as necessitated an expenditure of $509,000 a year in the way of salaries. I did not include one laborer in the estimate. Mr. Chairman, the Mississippi River Commission to-day owns twice as many vessels, large and small, as belong to the Federal Navy. They are not so expensive, I admit, and they are not all so large; but they are more than twice as numerous. There are more than 200 vessels, large and small, belonging to the Mississippi River Commission. The plant of that commission is wonderful. It shows that these gentlemen have a proper conception of the magnitude of the work upon which they are employed. They expect it to last many years, and expect it to involve an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars.

There is another objection I have to this improvement; and that is the imperative necessity of renewing it every five or six or eight years. Where timber is used in narrowing the channel they use the soft woods that grow along the margin of the river. The life of that kind of timber, exposed as it is to the alternations of wet and dry, is from four to five years; so that every four or five years this work will have to be renewed.

I presume every gentleman here is familiar with the method that the commission have adopted. They propose to narrow the channel to a uniform width of 3,000 feet, making it necessary for them to establish a bank nearly the whole length of that stream. They do this by driving two rows of piles a few feet apart, binding them together by wire ropes; then they interweave those with brush for the purpose of retarding the current, expecting that the sediment will be deposited, and in that way they will build up an artificial bank.

They then protect this by immense mattresses of willows and No. 8 wire, lying the mattresses from the bottom up along the sides to the top of this improvement, protecting the natural bank in the same way, and covering that with stone above the low-water mark. Then back of that, at a distance of a quarter or half a mile, they build their levees for the purpose of controlling the river at its flood. Any one can see that this necessitates the building of several thousand miles of levees, because every tributary must have a levee until a point is reached up the river where the bank is of the same height as the levee on the bank of the Mississippi. Thus the work has to be continued, involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions. There is the Saint Francis River, running parallel, which must also be so treated; there is the Atchafalaya, which must be so treated, with all the innumerable bayous and lagoons which are tributary to these streams.

This is the kind of expenditure, gentlemen of the committee, that you are invited to make; and every dollar that is invested, every appropriation that you make gives these gentlemen so much stronger hold upon you. Is it not time to stop this wasteful, prodigal expenditure of the people's money?

Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter I notice in this bill (I did not examine it until to-day) to which I wish to call attention, because there is something of novelty about it. I find it on page 20:

Improving Monongahela River, Pennsylvania and West Virginia: Continuing improvement, $121,200; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to negotiate for the purchase of the works of the Monongahela Navigation Company, situated in the Monongahela River, in the States of Pennsylvania and West Virginia; and in order to ascertain the value of said works the Secretary of War shall appoint a commission of three competent engineers from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, who shall value and appraise the same and report to the Secretary of War. And if the said Monongahela Navigation Company shall offer and bind itself to take for said works a price deemed by the Secretary of War to be satisfactory and not excessive, he shall so report to the Congress at its next succeeding session; but if the said Monongahela Navigation Company refuses to sell its works, or demands a price therefor deemed to be excessive, then the Secretary of War shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire said works by condemnation for the United States; or, in the exercise of his discretion, the Secretary of War may, and he is hereby authorized to, take possession of said works in the name of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, is not that somewhat of a harsh method of proceeding? Is there not something of hardship in that, gentlemen of the committee? Here is a navigation company authorized to exist, authorized to possess certain property, possessing that property under sanction of law, which they do not want to sell perhaps, and here we give authority to take possession of that property, and if they can not agree on a price, or if the owner will not sell it for such sum as the Secretary of War thinks it ought to bring, then he is authorized to take it without price.

Is that Jeffersonian Democracy? Did Mr. Jefferson discover such ample authority on the part of the Federal Government in the Constitution? Gentlemen, it will not do for you to talk here about being Jeffersonian Democrats. You will have to limit your classification to Jackson men. Old Hickory might do that—Jefferson never.

There is one thing in this bill which perhaps in one sense I commend, and that is $15,000,000 and probably $18,000,000 will be in it before it passes through the two Houses. I am glad of that amount in one sense, because I remember something of history. Four years ago the Republican party in this House had a majority, I think, of 11 votes. That majority was seduced into passing a river and harbor bill appropriating $18,000,000, and it carried 81 majority of Democrats into the next House. I am hoping history will repeat itself, and if you gentlemen desire to pass a river and harbor bill of $18,000,000, grief will come to you as it came to us; and that would be the only solace I would have for the enormities I find in the bill. [Laughter.]

There is one other thing connected with this bill I can commend, and that is the very liberal manner in which the committee treated its membership. [Laughter.]

Here is a gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART], an amiable gentleman, who ought to have very largely whatever he asks for; and, by the way, he has asked largely, and secured nearly a round million for Texas. Here is the gentleman from New York [Mr. BURLEIGH], active, energetic, always around when anything for New York is to be secured, and he has been able to secure nearly $900,000 for the Empire State. Here is my friend from California [Mr. MARKHAM], who is modest and quiet and new to his duties here. Just look at the bill and see how amply he has provided for the State of California. What will he not do when he has served a score of years!

Mr. MARKHAM. He knows its necessities.

Mr. HEPBURN. Look at Michigan! She has been well represented in the committee; magnificently in the bill. [Laughter.] I doubt whether there is an inlet to the land from the surrounding lakes which has not a place in this bill. They are all named without regard to the unpronounceable character of their names. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time yielded to the gentleman, forty minutes, has expired. There remain thirty minutes to the opponents of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Other gentlemen may need that time. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. If I have the floor I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was informed the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] might wish to be heard. If he does not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa to control the time left to the opponents of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will extend my remarks in print and leave that time for other gentlemen.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, thanking my friend from Alabama for the few minutes yielded to me, I will endeavor to correct some of the statements made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the opportunity to correct which he denied me in the course of his speech.

When the gentleman from Iowa said he had gone down the river 20 miles from Saint Louis in 1880, and saw a number of barges belonging to the Mississippi River commerce lying there idle, and then went on to state that it indicated there was no grain from Saint Louis being shipped southward, I rose not for the purpose of contradicting his statement about seeing barges lying idle along the banks of the river, but to correct his assertion that the southward direction was not the one which any considerable amount of grain was taking. He denied me the opportunity to have read some figures which I now call his attention to.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a statement of the quantity of wheat shipped by the river route from Saint Louis to New Orleans prior to the construction of the jetties at the mouth of the river and a statement of the shipments made since the completion of the jetties there. I hope my friend from Iowa will give heed to these.

There were shipped before the construction of the jetties—this is the exports of grain from New Orleans—4,400,000 bushels of wheat. The depth of the channel on the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi River at that time was from 12 to 18 feet. There have been shipped since the construction of the jetties 48,700,000 bushels of wheat, and the depth of the channel at the mouth of the river has been increased to 26 and 30 feet.

Mr. HEPBURN. How many years since the jetties were completed?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It gives the amount in round numbers before and after the construction of the jetties.

Mr. HEPBURN. But how many years since the completion of the jetties?

Mr. BLANCHARD. My recollection is the jetties were completed in 1879.

Before the jetties were constructed the foreign steamship arrivals—in 1873—numbered 83, with an aggregate tonnage of 107,000 tons. After the construction of the jetties, in 1883, the number of foreign steamships aggregated 402; increasing from 83 per annum before the construction up to 402 per annum after the construction, while the aggregate tonnage was increased from 107,000 to 653,000 tons.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. How much of the aggregate of 48,000,000 bushels wheat was received by rail from California for shipment by way of New Orleans?

Mr. BLANCHARD. How much was shipped by rail from California?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The statement does not show that, but I know it was comparatively very little.

Now, Mr. Chairman, pursuing the inquiry further: Before the jetties were built a vessel of 1,500 or 2,000 tons' capacity was above the average in arrivals at New Orleans. Now, since the success of the jetties, vessels of 5,000 tons' capacity are loaded at New Orleans. Before the jetties vessels were loaded to not over 15 feet draught; now vessels are laden to 26 and 27½ feet draught, and pass out to sea without difficulty. Before the jetties were completed skillful pilotage and management were of no avail, for the channels were ever shifting; now, where a vessel is kept within the jetty channel, detentions are unknown.

Before the jetties the tonnage on vessels was from $1.25 to $1.50 per ton. Now it can and has been had for 50 cents a ton, and a proportionate reduction in the rates of insurance on vessels and cargoes has also been made.

Before the jetties the exports of grain were 5,750,000 a year; now they are 14,250,000. The total exports were valued at $68,000,000; now they amount to $94,000,000; an increase of 50 per cent.

Before the jetties foreign freights were 18 to 24 cents per bushel; now they are from 8 to 12 cents. Nor is it true, as some suppose, that grain is liable to become musty and thereby injured by passing through the heated regions in transit through New Orleans to a foreign market. Here is a well-authenticated statement completely refuting that:

In 1879 or 1880 two barges were loaded with corn and wheat at Saint Paul, as an experiment to test this very question. Its transit at points was purposely delayed, and it was held in New Orleans in the month of July, and was several months on the way; yet on arrival at Liverpool it rated the same as to condition, upon inspection, that it did at Saint Paul. Another instance: a cargo of bulk grain and cotton was loaded upon a steamship; the steamer went ashore at or near the mouth, was brought back to the city, and with cargo intact was placed in dock, repaired, and again went to sea, and in about eighty days after shipment from New Orleans arrived at Liverpool in a perfectly sound condition; all of which proved not only that our Southern climate does not affect its condition, but, as claimed by Mr. Eads, a vessel with a full cargo can be taken from the water into a dock without injury.

Now as to freight rates. The difference is largely in favor of the river route. During the season of navigation of the Mississippi River the rate from Saint Louis to Liverpool, by rail to New York and by river to New Orleans, has been as follows for the last three years:

1883.	Via railroad to New York, per bushel	23 to 29
	Via river to New Orleans, per bushel	17 to 23
	Difference in favor of the river route	6
1884.	Via rail to New York, per bushel	15 to 29
	Via river to New Orleans, per bushel	11 to 20
	Difference in favor of the river route	4 to 9
1885.	Via rail to New York, per bushel	14 to 27
	Via river to New Orleans, per bushel	13 to 13
	Difference in favor of the river route	1 to 14

Here is an average difference for the three years of at least 6 cents per bushel in favor of the river route. The country affected by this difference produced in 1885, according to the estimate of the Agricultural Department, 357,112,000 bushels of wheat, which, at 6 cents per bushel, would be worth $21,466,720 more than it is. With this great difference and advantage in favor of the river route, a very considerable portion of the grain crops of the country will, undoubtedly, go southward, the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is useless, Mr. Chairman, to pursue the subject further. There is no indisposition on the part of the grain from the West to find an outlet to sea through the Mississippi River at New Orleans, and the figures show it and refute the mere assertions of gentlemen to the contrary.

Again, the gentleman from Iowa made an extravagant statement concerning the number of vessels used by the Mississippi River Commission in the work of improving that stream. Now, as showing the true facts relative to this, I read from the report of the commission itself:

Mr. HEPBURN. What report?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The report for 1885.

Mr. HEPBURN. Take the report for 1884 and see what it says.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This statement embraces the entire plant belonging to the Government for the improvement of more than 1,500 miles of navigable water way on the great Father of Waters.

The present plant now in use by the Mississippi Commission comprises 14 steam towboats, 7 steam-launches, tugs, and survey boats, 49 quarter-boats, 83 pile-drivers, 6 hydraulic graders, 1 dredge, 6 dump boats, 2 pump boats, 3 derrick boats, 6 shop boats, 5 dock boats and store boats, 19 mattress boats, 2 ways, 8 screen boats, 263 barges, 25 coal boats, shells, and flats, and a number of skiffs, yawls, and sounding boats, tools, instruments, gauging apparatus, &c., aggregating in value $1,267,000.

However large that showing may make the number of boats belonging to the Government and the value of the plant in use, it is for the improvement of over 1,500 miles of navigable water way from the Des Moines Rapids to the Gulf of Mexico, and is not greater than the actual needs of the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES] allow me to make one statement in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. In regard to the rate of freight from New Orleans the gentleman from Iowa said there had been no reduction.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh no; I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I understood the gentleman to say that. I will make this statement: I remember seeing two or three years ago a statement from the Cotton Exchange of New Orleans that the saving upon cotton freight to Liverpool and the East was a saving of a dollar a bale; and that the saving on freight rates to the commerce of the Mississippi Valley by the jetties had paid for the jetties every two years since they had been in existence.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have raised no question about that.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this general debate, as far as it has progressed, and the opposition, so far as made to the bill reported by the committee, have amply vindicated the wisdom of the proposition made by the chairman of the committee, that the general debate should be dispensed with. It seems to me that the opposition is perfectly trivial, and that it has amounted to nothing in the hour, or more than an hour, that has been occupied by the adversaries of the bill.

Why, sir, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] has made an objection to the bill on the ground of the perfection of the Mississippi River. He says that it has come from the hands of the Creator so perfect, so fit for navigation, that it was entirely useless to appropriate money for its improvement. Well, Mr. Chairman, the Mississippi River has come from the hands of its Creator in a very imperfect state. Like all natural blessings it has been bestowed upon us to be improved, to be perfected by human skill. The Mississippi River is no exception to that rule. On the contrary, it needs more improvement, it needs more work than any other river in this country on account of its peculiar nature and eccentric habits.

The gentleman assumes that the work that has been done and the work that is contemplated by the commission on that river consists of levees. That is very far from being the fact. The Congress of the United States saw fit several years ago to create a Mississippi River Commission, and to put this great river of 2,000 miles of navigable water under that commission. It was an experiment, and was conceded at the time to be an experiment. But they have gone further, and the results obtained justify the wisdom of that measure. They have attained a depth now at Providence reach and Plumb Point reach of about 13 feet to show for their work.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. What has it cost—how many millions—to get 13 feet of water at these two points?

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. The gentleman may have his opinion of the cost——

Mr. HEPBURN. It has cost a million of dollars a foot.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. No matter if it has cost more than that, the results would justify it.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] said they were taxing the people of his State to improve the Lower Mississippi and that the people of Kansas had no interest in that improvement. It is, Mr. Chairman, to the interest of the people of Kansas, a large wheat-growing State, that their grain should find its way to the seaboard at a low cost of transportation. That is a great wheat-growing country and greatly stands in need of cheap transportation.

Mr. DUNHAM. The grain does not want to go that way.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. When the facilities are furnished it will go that way, and it has gone that way to the extent of millions and millions of bushels, as has been shown by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. It will always follow the cheapest route.

Objection further was made that certain harbors are to be improved on that river and not on others. The answer is, this is part of the work of the commission. The gentleman from Kansas assumes the work by the commission consists in building the levees. This is not true. Their work consists of a contraction of the stream and making revetments where it is necessary to prevent cut-offs that might change the channel of the river. The commission does not hesitate to avail itself of levees already constructed, and to supplement them when it is necessary for channel improvement or for the benefit of navigation. It is no part of their business to reclaim lands. Why should the commission seek to reclaim lands when it is not to their interest and outside of their functions?

The gentleman from Iowa has made the same kind of attack upon the bill. These attacks are merely beating over again the old straw that has come down to us from the last session of Congress. It is that and nothing more. The gentleman from Iowa makes a concluding objection, that the bill amounts to $15,000,000, and perhaps more; and he has conjured up the apparition of the bill of 1882, which appropriated $18,000,000, and exhibited it here to "affright the souls of fearful adversaries." That bill has no terror for us. This bill is not like the bill of 1882, not even in amount. This is a bill which provides for two fiscal years, and dividing the aggregate amount between these two fiscal years it is only $7,500,000 for each. As long as eight years ago, in 1878, the appropriation by Congress for one fiscal year was over $8,000,000.

Since then the estimated wealth of this country has increased enormously, our population has increased wonderfully, and do we not need any larger appropriations to furnish transportation for this increased population and this increased wealth? And yet in point of fact we are now appropriating a smaller amount annually than in 1878. Why, sir, as for that bill of 1882, the House of Representatives in the December following its passage adopted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War to furnish information about some portions of the bill, and, among other things, to inform the House "whether any money appropriated by that act was appropriated for works or objects that are not in the interest of, or for the benefit of, commerce or navigation." The Secretary of War, in response to the resolution, culled out from that eighteen million bill a number of objects and items which in his opinion were not for the interests of commerce or for the good of navigation.

I have taken the trouble to add them up, and they amount to less than 5 per cent. of the eighteen millions appropriated, and I undertake to say that if the unworthy objects in the bill that is now pending before this committee could be culled out they would not amount to 2 per cent. of the total appropriation made by the bill. That leaves 98 per cent. of this bill that is wholly beneficial to our commerce, foreign and internal. And, Mr. Chairman, what is that commerce? The report of the Bureau of Statistics, which I hold in my hand, shows that in the year 1884 the foreign commerce of the United States was valued at one billion four hundred and eight millions; and the same report goes on to declare that our internal commerce is beyond computation, that it can not be estimated, but that it is at least fifty times as great as our foreign commerce; so that it must be a good deal more than $50,000,000,000.

Now, sir, what is the use of these carping criticisms and these puerile attacks upon a bill of this character, whose object it is to furnish transportation for this enormous commerce? The country demands cheap transportation, and if this $15,000,000 here appropriated will reduce the cost of transportation one quarter of 1 per cent., it well give back to the people more than the amount appropriated in the saving to the producers and consumers of our widely extended country. Sir, the population of this country and the productions of this country have increased more rapidly than the means of transportation. Private capital and private enterprise have done much to furnish the required transportation.

Private enterprise, as the chairman [Mr. WILLIS] has stated, has built 128,000 miles of railroads in this country, and they represent an investment of $8,000,000,000. Those railroads carry, as he has stated, 400,000,000 tons of freight annually. And, sir, private enterprise would have improved our natural water ways if it had been permitted to do so, but whenever private enterprise undertook to do that, it was met by the stern injunction of the General Government, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther." This Government has assumed exclusive jurisdiction over the harbors and the navigable waters of this country, and when it assumed that jurisdiction it assumed also the obligation to improve them.

Mr. Chairman, this country is peculiarly adapted to cheap and ample water communications. There is no other country on the face of the earth so highly favored in that respect, and it becomes us, representing such vast interests here, the interests of agriculture, the interests of mining, the interests of the commerce to which I have referred, to assist nature, and to furnish the cheap transportation that the people demand. That is a duty that is devolved upon us, and we ought to meet it. Our agricultural interests are more important than any other. More people are engaged in agriculture. More capital is invested in agriculture than in any other occupation. Agriculture receives less protection and bears more burdens than any other interest, and one of the heaviest burdens now resting upon our farmers is the heavy cost of transporting their crops to market. Hence we find the farmers so unanimous and so earnest in asking for these appropriations and these improvements. Our wheat and our cotton are now engaged in a death-struggle with the cheap wheat and cotton of India. England and other countries have been building water communications to cheapen transportation. The consequence is a great increase in the production of cheap grain and cheap cotton to compete with American wheat and American cotton. Since the opening of the Suez Canal American cereal exports have diminished in proportion to the increase of Indian exports. We are therefore compelled in self-defense and on behalf of our farmers to follow the example of these countries and furnish cheaper transportation. Our exports will increase, prices will increase, prosperity will increase as carrying rates are cut down.

As I have said, the railroads do much to furnish transportation, but it is well known that they do it primarily for their own benefit, and that they charge high rates upon the freight that goes over them. The problem that is agitating State Legislatures, the problem that this Congress has been grappling with for eight or ten years, is how to regulate the railroads; but, sir, in my judgment, the best solution of that problem is to be found in cheap water transportation, in the competition of the water ways. Nothing excels water for cheap transportation. When our northern lakes and rivers are blockaded with ice and navigation is obstructed, up go the railroad rates; but when spring returns and the ice disappears, down go the railroad rates. The railroad lines between Cincinnati and New Orleans raise their rates from 50 cents per hundred pounds in high water to 80 cents per hundred pounds in low water. These facts show the influence of water transportation in controlling the railroads, and that is the most effectual way of regulating the charges of these railroads, which carry 400,000,000 tons of freight a year in this country.

But these appropriations, in regard to which gentlemen make complaint as to their amount, are not like other appropriations; they are for works which are permanent in their nature. The benefits are continuing. The appropriations for the support of the Army and Navy, for the Indians, for pensions, are consumed in their use; their expenditure leaves no trace behind; but the results of these appropriations for rivers and harbors remain with us; and, as I have shown, they are beneficent. Why, sir, according to the report of the Labor Bureau, one million laborers were recently out of employment, and in the debate on the labor-arbitration bill a few days ago it was stated that this number had increased to one million and a half.

Now, while I do not believe that it is one of the functions of this Government to furnish employment to its citizens, yet, when in times of depression and distress, and we can produce this beneficent result in the performance of a legitimate public duty, when expediency goes hand in hand with the Constitution, as it does in this case, it is our duty to make liberal appropriations for these public works, and thus benefit the labor of the country. In no bill that Congress passes do the expenditures go so directly to the people or benefit so directly the labor of the country as these appropriations for rivers and harbors. They furnish work to the laboring man and they give him wages for his work.

Mr. Chairman, if I have any time remaining I yield it to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART].

The CHAIRMAN. There are five minutes of the gentleman's time remaining.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the appropriation made for harbor improvement at Galveston, the largest commercial city upon the coast of the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, has been attacked by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], I feel it my duty to say a few words in reply. It is true that quite a number of the citizens of Galveston have not been satisfied with the progress of harbor improvement at that city under the supervision of the Government engineers, and they believed that better and more speedy results in the harbor improvement of that city could be obtained by this Government entering into a contract with the great engineer Capt. James B. Eads than would be accomplished by the Army engineers.

About this there was a division of sentiment among the people of Galveston. But a committee came from Galveston to this city during the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress and prevailed upon the Senators and Representatives from Texas to urge upon Congress the adoption of what was known as the "Eads plan" for harbor improvement at Galveston, and in doing this the Texas delegation who favored it believed that they were serving the best interests of Galveston and of the country.

A bill was introduced in this House which, in effect, was a contract with Captain Eads on the part of this Government for the improvement of Galveston Harbor, and it was commonly called the "Eads bill;" and one precisely like it was introduced in the Senate, and I am not sure, but think it was passed by that body. It may not be improper for me to say that although I never actively opposed the Eads bill, I was never friendly to it, and that I was very much opposed to its becoming a part of the river and harbor bill, and I was glad when it was not incorporated in said bill.

In this House the Eads bill was never acted upon, and I do not think it was reported to the House from the committee to which it had been referred. But it was during the pendency of the "Eads bill" that the gentleman from Iowa heard the declarations made that there was no possibility of accomplishing good at Galveston by the continuation of the plans then adopted by the board of engineers. I also remember what has been stated by the gentleman, that Mr. Ochiltree, who then was the immediate representative of the city of Galveston, moved to strike from the river and harbor bill the appropriation of $250,000 that had been made for the improvement of Galveston Harbor, and that he succeeded in having it done. I shall never forget it.

But, Mr. Chairman, the striking out of the appropriation made for Galveston in the bill of 1884 and the denunciations of the Government plans and of the Government engineers were but the indiscretions of a hot-tempered zeal for the success of the "Eads bill," and I beg you to consider the injustice of denying a sufficient appropriation for harbor improvement at Galveston because of what has been said by comparatively a few men, of whom it is not disrespectful to say that they knew no more about the matter than many others who differed with them in regard to it.

I never shared in the opinions that were then expressed about the work at Galveston. I then regretted, and I now regret, that in the zeal manifested for the Eads bill such opinions were expressed. Doubtless the gentlemen who expressed those opinions believed they were correct, but they were not, in my judgment, based upon established facts. What was the criticism made by Captain Eads upon the work at Galveston? In brief, he said the jetty walls were too far apart and not high enough, and for these reasons they could never accomplish the result predicted by the Government engineers. I thought if these objections were well founded that the correction could be as easily applied by the Government engineers and at less cost to the Government.

General Newton, the Chief of Engineers, has submitted during this session a supplemental report upon the improvement of the harbor at Galveston, in which it is shown that the changes proposed to be made at that point will remove all just cause for criticism, and I see no reason why the work of harbor improvement at that point should not be prosecuted, and why the Government engineers may not be relied upon to obtain all the success that could be secured by Captain Eads, or by any one else, and if you will but make as large appropriations for Galveston as were required by the provisions of the Eads bill they will secure such success quite as rapidly.

I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact that no appropriation has been made for the improvement of Galveston Harbor since the passage of the bill for river and harbor appropriations in 1882, and that no work has been done at Galveston since that appropriation was exhausted. The appropriation made for Galveston in the bill of 1884, amounting to $250,000, was, as I have before stated, stricken out, and the river and harbor bill for 1885 failed to pass the Senate, and for these reasons Galveston has been without an appropriation since 1882, and this fact should appeal strongly to the House for a liberal appropriation for Galveston at this time.

Galveston is the largest city upon the coast line of Texas, and has a population of not less than 35,000 and possibly 40,000 inhabitants, and it is now the largest commercial port in my State. I deny that money expended for harbor improvement at Galveston has been wasted.

I assert that the work done by the Government at Galveston has been of great benefit to that port and to the commerce of Texas. It has fixed the channel, and has given an increased depth of water upon the outer bar of not less than 18 inches if not 2 feet, and I make this assertion upon the testimony of experienced seamen and shipmasters who have been thoroughly acquainted with the entrance to Galveston Harbor for more than twenty years, and their testimony is corroborated by the pilot books kept at Galveston.

It is unfortunate that the work of harbor improvement at Galveston was stopped by the refusal to accept of the appropriation made in the river and harbor bill of 1884, but I trust that this appropriation may not be decreased, for it is no more than is necessary, and with it the work may be resumed, and with appropriations that may hereafter be made I trust that the work may be continued until all obstructions to navigation are permanently removed. My friend from Iowa said that I was amiable and ought to have largely what I ask for, and that I had asked largely and had obtained for Texas nearly a round million of dollars.

Will my friend permit me to suggest a better reason for the appropriations made for harbor improvement on that part of our coast which lies within the limits of Texas? In the first place, much is required to be done on that coast, and the estimates furnished by the Secretary of War are large, but not larger than are absolutely required, and no greater proportion of those estimates have been allowed in the pending bill than have been given to other sections of the country, and in many instances they are not so great.

It must be remembered that Texas is a great State. Within her limits are more than 274,000 square miles, and this great area of territory is divided into more than two hundred counties, and the State is rapidly increasing in population. In 1870 the population of Texas was 819,000; in 1880 it was 1,597,618; in October, 1884, it had increased to 2,215,318, and now it is safe to assert that we have a population of not less than two and one-half millions.

It has been said, and I believe truly, that Texas has a cotton belt as large as the State of Mississippi, a sugar section as large as the State of Louisiana, a wheat region as large as the State of Ohio, a mineral bed as large as the State of Pennsylvania, and grazing grounds larger than the State of Kentucky. Texas produces one-fifth, if not one-fourth, of the cotton crop of the United States. In 1884 her cotton crop was 1,456,000 bales. In all the valuable woods she is without a rival.

In the report of forestry made by Mr. Sargeant to Census Bureau it is shown that in Texas there is growing a pine forest that if now cut into lumber would aggregate 65,000,000,000 feet. Large crops of corn and small grain are made, and much larger crops of grain would be made if cheap transportation could be had to carry the surplus to other markets. We have beef and mutton enough to feed all the people of the United States, and our live-stock of all kinds are estimated to be not less than twelve millions in number, and to-day Texas is the largest wool-growing State in this Union, Ohio to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. REED, of Maine. We will take care of the wool-growing interest for you. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. We will discuss that when we reach the proper bill. Yet with all these vast products, with her increasing wealth and population, Texas, unlike other States of this Union, is almost entirely without navigable rivers to carry her products to the sea or to regulate and cheapen freights by rail. Within the State of Texas there are more than seven thousand miles of railway, and the agricultural interests of Texas are completely at the mercy of railroad combinations.

With a coast line of more than 400 miles in length, there is not a harbor in which a vessel drawing 18 feet of water can enter, and but one in which a vessel of 15 feet draught can safely venture. There is a pressing necessity not only for improvement of the harbor at Galveston but for all the harbors upon the coast of Texas.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEWART. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, almost destitute as Texas is of navigable rivers there is but one practicable mode by which transportation may be cheapened in that State and her people liberated from the domination of corporate power, and that is to improve not only Galveston Harbor but all the harbors of the Texas coast. Let there be as many competitive points for freight by water as the coast will supply.

Short hauls by competitive lines of railway to these competitive points on the Gulf coast will do much to solve the problem, and I am sure it will result in benefit to every portion of the State. Nor is Texas alone interested in the development and improvement of the harbors upon her coast. All that vast extent of territory lying north of Texas between the Mississippi River on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west have a very great interest in the improvement and development of those harbors, for they are their nearest outlet to the sea.

If a wise policy shall be adopted and pursued by this Government, which shall bring us into closer and better commercial relations with Mexico and the countries of Central and South America, the day is not far distant when the ports on the Texas coast will be the gateways through which a commerce will pass that now it is impossible to even approximate its great value, and in national importance those ports will be second to few others to be found in this Union. Deep water in Texas harbors is not only a necessity to the people of Texas, but it is equally so to a very large portion of the people of the United States.

I desire to emphasize what has been so well stated by the chairman of the committee, that in the preparation of this bill no attempt was made to divide the appropriations among the different States, geographical lines were not observed, and we did not consider any place merely with reference to its locality. We only looked to the commercial importance and necessities of each place as shown by the report of the officer of this Government having in charge its improvement, and to such other testimony tending to establish these facts as may have been brought to the attention of the committee.

I trust that the same rule which controlled the committee in the preparation of the bill will govern the House in its consideration, and that no sectional feeling will prevent any one from giving to the bill that fair and impartial consideration which should be accorded to a measure of so much importance to the entire people of this country.

Public sentiment in this country is far in advance of Congress upon the subject of internal improvements. This assertion may be strange, but it is nevertheless true; recent events show that it is true.

Large conventions have been held in different sections of this Union for the express purpose of considering the improvement of our water ways, and they have implored Congress to make sufficient appropriations. These conventions were held at Saint Paul, Kansas City, New Orleans, Savannah, and Tuscaloosa. They were not merely the representatives of special interests, but they were largely composed of men representing the entire business interests of the country.

At the Saint Paul convention it was declared to be the sense of the convention that an annual expenditure of $25,000,000 should be made for the improvement of our water routes, and in the other conventions which I have named it was declared that an enlightened policy demanded liberal appropriations from this Government for the improvement of its rivers and harbors.

Cheap transportation is the key to prosperity, and there is no question before the American people at this time of more vital importance to their prosperity than this question of cheap transportation. All admit that water routes furnish the cheapest transportation, but they do more; they regulate and cheapen transportation by railways. All the conventions to which I have alluded bear testimony to this fact, and it was abundantly sustained by the testimony of all who appeared before the committee during its deliberations.

But it must not be concluded that because water transportation is cheaper, and makes transportation by rail cheaper, that the improvement of our rivers and harbors will injure the railways of the country. It will not do it. It must be remembered that articles of light weight will always seek the more rapid transit by rail, while heavy, bulky articles can be transported with more convenience and at less cost by water, but the great and underlying cause of there being no destructive antagonism between water and rail transportation is to be found in the fact that the cheap transportation afforded by navigable waters to the heavy farm products of the country adds largely to the wealth of the producers and their increased ability to supply their wants and gratify their desires creates and expands commerce, manufactures, and all other industries which give employment to all kinds of carriers.

No class receive greater benefits from the increased prosperity of the country than do our common carriers.

From Poor's Manual for Railroads for 1885 I learn that at the close of last year there were in the United States 125,151 miles of railroads and also 156,496 miles of track, estimated to have cost $6,924,554,444, or but little less than $45,000 per mile. I suppose this estimate includes rolling-stock and all the equipments necessary for their operation, and as the amount is large it may also include watered stock, fictitious bonds, and other fraudulent devices too frequently connected with railroad management in this country.

Of one thing we may be sure, and it is that large interest upon this amount and perhaps more is annually exacted from the producers of this country by those who have the management and control of said railways. It is a burden upon the agricultural interests of this country, which can be lightened by the improvement of the rivers and harbors, and I believe more substantial good will result to the people from liberal expenditures for this purpose than for any other, save the necessary expense of maintaining the Government.

What interest upon the cost and equipage of these roads is annually expended in their maintenance and repair I do not know; I have frequently heard it asserted that not less than 50 per cent. of their earnings were thus expended. But for my purpose now I will assume that not more than 10 per cent. of their original cost is thus expended in the annual repair and equipment of these roads, and we have a sum of more than $600,000,000. How infinitesimal does the amount of this bill appear in comparison with the amount that is annually expended by corporations in the improvement of their railways.

Mr. Chairman, it is believed that we now have in this country more than sixty millions of people, and that the aggregate wealth of the country is not less than fifty billions of dollars. These two facts—the population and wealth of the country—should be properly considered in forming our judgment about the pending bill.

The great number of people who inhabit our vast area of territory, with their restless commercial energies, require the greatest and best facilities for the cheapest transportation to be obtained by means of our water ways, and the wealth of the country is abundantly large to enable the Government to have made such improvement of our water routes as will render them adapted to the ever-increasing demands of commerce, and I believe it is the imperative duty of the Government to do it.

Why should the Representatives of the people hesitate to make sufficient appropriations for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country, when they know that the improvement of our water routes will cheapen transportation and reduce the amount of money annually taken from the pockets of the people by corporations?

It is not a pleasant suggestion, but it is nevertheless true, that this Government has—in land and money—donated vastly more money for the construction of railways than it has from its foundation until now appropriated for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Navigable waters are free to all, and they are free from the oppression of corporate power, and, if properly protected and improved by the Government, they will be of incalculable value to the people. The people have asked that sufficient appropriations shall be made, and I hope that this Congress will not fail to comply with their request.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am a seeker after information in reference to this bill, and I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee. I understand this bill appropriates $2,250,000 for the Lower Mississippi. Whereabouts will I find estimates and plans for the work at New Orleans?

Mr. WILLIS. It is in the fourth volume of the report of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. HISCOCK. What year?

Mr. WILLIS. This present fiscal year. I hold it here in my hand.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to have the date of the estimate. I do not care what volume it is in.

Mr. WILLIS. It is before me and in a moment it will be given to the gentleman.

Mr. HISCOCK. I pass on from that while he is looking for it, and ask if he will tell me where I will find the report for the rectification of the Red and Atchafalaya Rivers?

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman's question was in reference to the port of New Orleans. He will find that on page 2871 of the fourth volume of the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the date of the estimate?

Mr. WILLIS. In December last, 1885.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the estimate?

Mr. WILLIS. Six hundred and eighty-three thousand six hundred dollars.

Mr. HISCOCK. For the rectification of the Red and Atchafalaya Rivers, where will we find that?

Mr. WILLIS. In one second.

Mr. HISCOCK. Read in that connection also the estimate for the Greenville reach.

Mr. WILLIS. In regard to the Red and Atchafalaya Rivers the gentleman will find it on page 2868.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the date of the recommendation?

Mr. WILLIS. It is in the last report; December, 1885.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is a recommendation of that date?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir. In regard to the Greenville reach, about which the gentleman also inquires, he will find it on page 2871. The estimate is $186,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. That leaves a million and a half for the general improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. WILLIS. One million seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HISCOCK. Where will I find estimates, plans, and recommendations for that amount?

Mr. WILLIS. I have them before me in the report of the committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. Give the date.

Mr. WILLIS. Page 2871. I will read it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Who is that by?

Mr. WILLIS. The Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. HISCOCK. What date?

Mr. WILLIS. Last report, December, 1885.

ESTIMATES OF FUNDS FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1887.

For continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River from Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois River	$500,000
For continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois River to Cairo, Ill	1,000,000
For continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River from Cairo, Ill., to the Head of the Passes, including the improvement of the Red River at and below the head of the Atchafalaya	5,000,000

Mr. HISCOCK. In that report is there any recommendation this money should be appropriated and expended; and, if so, by whom?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. By whom?

Mr. WILLIS. The commission.

Mr. HISCOCK. The commission recommended it? Give me the names of the gentlemen who recommended it. And I ask these questions, if the gentleman will pardon me, in the light of the declarations made on the floor in the last Congress, I believe, that the plan of the Mississippi River Commission for the improvement of the Mississippi River had proved a failure, and that it had been demonstrated it was a failure and money was being wasted there. I understood these declarations to have been made with deliberation heretofore.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not wish to take up the time of the gentleman, but he will recollect there is a difference between the contraction system and the system of revetment.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has the Mississippi River Commission changed their plan?

Mr. WILLIS. They have not.

Mr. HISCOCK. From the declarations we had at the last session in reference to them it would appear they had. You leave it, then, to the Mississippi River Commission?

Mr. WILLIS. In their statement, if the gentleman will examine it, there would be no further appropriation in the direction he suggests. The gentleman asks who signed it? The following gentlemen:

Q. A. Gillmore, colonel engineers, brevet major-general, U. S. A., president Mississippi River Commission; Chas. R. Suter, major of engineers, U. S. A.; Henry Mitchell, Coast and Geodetic Survey; B. M. Harrod, R. S. Taylor, S. W. Ferguson.

Mr. Comstock files a supplemental report, in which he recommends two and a half millions.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What is his recommendation?

Mr. WILLIS. A million dollars for Plum Point reach; as much (that is a million) for the Lake Providence reach; half a million for Memphis and the Atchafalaya. That, he says, is ample for the prosecution of those works for the coming fiscal year, and we recommend a quarter million dollars less than Mr. Comstock, the dissenting engineer, recommends.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But you do not recommend its use in the way in which he says that it ought to be used.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Comstock, as the gentleman understands, files a minority report. The committee has been controlled by the views of the other members of the commission, constituting six out of the seven. In other words, we took the judgment of six in preference to the judgment of one. But the question put to me was in regard to the amount recommended by Mr. Comstock, and I have given it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. He recommends an appropriation of $2,000,000 for specific purposes, and you recommend that it be scattered all over the river.

Mr. WILLIS. He recommends two and a half millions.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] if the report he has before him is the one transmitted by the Secretary of War to Congress. Is it anything other than the report for 1885?

Mr. WILLIS. It is the last report; not the one that you are looking at.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have here the report of the Secretary of War for 1885, and I find in it the report of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman has probably been misled by the fact that both the report for 1884 and the report for 1885 are in the same volume.

The last report he will find on page 2859. Then there is the supplemental report filed January 15, 1886, which is Executive Document 38, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have the document.

The CHAIRMAN. There are fifteen minutes remaining to the opponents of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. If no one desires to occupy the time, I will call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that it would be useless to ask to reserve these fifteen minutes until to-morrow, and so I will say crudely to-night what perhaps I might say in better shape to-morrow. Although this debate has come upon me somewhat unexpectedly, yet I have a few general considerations which I should like to submit to the committee. My criticism upon the bill will be confined to the appropriations which are made for the benefit, it is said, of the Mississippi River. There are gentlemen in this House who will recollect the origin of this attempt to do something for the Mississippi River. It had its origin in two things: First, a general public clamor against the use of the public money for small creeks and inlets, and a desire that something should be done for what were called, in large language, "the great highways of commerce."

The second cause found its motive in an honest disposition on the part of this nation, especially in the North, to do something for the rehabilitation of the Southern States, their industry and commerce. Both motives were praiseworthy and deserve our highest respect. But if it shall prove, as it seems to me it has proved, that our efforts have resulted simply in a waste of public money, it is time that we call a halt to the transaction. My attention was first awakened to it by the action of members upon the last river and harbor bill but one. I recall the fact that the committee of the House of Representatives appointed and sent to examine and which actually did examine the Mississippi River problem upon the spot was not favorable to any such action as was taken by the House. On that committee were the present Speaker and other members not less distinguished and competent.

In the year 1884, I think it was, on the last river and harbor appropriation bill but one, the proposition was distinctly presented to this House that in all human probability, or, to put it mildly, that there was every reason to suppose, the attempt which had been made was a failure, and that the man who had proposed the plan, and who was specially relied upon to carry it out, Mr. Eads, seeing that failure, had withdrawn himself from any responsibility and resigned his position upon the commission. Under this state of facts the question was presented to this House as well as it could be in the hurry of the then shortened debate, that there was one plain duty for us to perform, and that was to confine this attempt to its experimental stage, to devote all the money that we were willing to spend to two reaches—the Plum Point reach and the Providence reach.

The idea of those who opposed that proposition, so simple and so just, was to scatter the money all up and down the river and make beginnings all around, which would force us to continue the appropriation before the result of the experiment had shown us whether it was a success or a failure; and the unanimous mustering of gentlemen on that side first opened the eyes of the country to the character of this transaction.

To improve a great highway for navigation the United States was willing to spend money. To throw money into the Mississippi River with the sole result of reclaiming land upon the banks was something which the people of the United States did not want to do with their money. Precisely that plan, thus objectionable, is followed out in this report and in this bill. We are asked to spend $2,000,000 all over the river, when to-day no man knows whether the attempt to control that river will be a success or a failure, a fact which could be easily ascertained by carrying out the work in one reach of the river. Am I not right then in saying the purpose and object of this is to get the United States involved in an expenditure to which no man can see an end?

Look at this proviso of the bill which says there shall be no money expended on levees; provided, however, that the commission may expend it if they want to. I say—and I mean no disrespect, for I came very near being fined for disrespect to the committee the last time I spoke on the subject—I say this is a proviso that something shall not be done provided the very fellows who intend to do it shall not think it ought to be done; and we already know they think it ought.

Now, what is the object of all this? Commerce is beyond the control of the Government of the United States. Commerce takes its own way. It is our business to notice the movements of trade. We can help them; we can not change them; that is beyond our utmost power. What is the tendency of modern mercantile transportation? It is upon the lines of shortest time. No merchant to-day sends his ship off on a voyage of months and months, taking his chances that it may arrive when the markets are free from the goods which the ship may bring. To-day he never amasses for himself those sudden and large profits which were the happy fortune of the merchants of olden days. No, sir; the great merchant of to-day makes his money by small percentages upon great transactions, and, therefore, he wishes to eliminate from his business every element of loss. He demands the element of time, in which losses may happen and fluctuations may take place shall be cut off and as far as possible annihilated with space. That is his object. Hence it is that the movement of commerce in this country is from east to west, and largely by railroads, because they save time, eliminate loss, and enable the merchant to calculate his small percentages on his great transactions.

The result of this mercantile system under a great law of nature is that men day after day are obtaining at the least cost the products of the whole world. Look at the result upon one single railroad. I noticed the other day, in the report of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad, some simple figures, to which I ask the attention of the committee. In 1865 every ton per mile cost 4.11 cents; in 1875 every ton per mile cost 2.10 cents; in 1885 it cost 1.28 cents. There is a law here visible which is working inevitably to the benefit of the consumer, working without the cognizance and apparently without the knowledge of Congress, if one could judge from speeches of members. These great laws of trade keep on without us, and we need not attempt here, by this bill, to make a change in them, because the result will be in this Mississippi part that we shall be only throwing away our money not in a change, but in a futile attempt to make a change.

If gentlemen on the other side believe that this Mississippi River improvement is a thing which is worth its cost, why do they not sit down, like patient and sensible men, and appropriate the money necessary to complete the experiment in one of these reaches, so that we may understand once for all whether it will be a failure or not? If we know what one reach costs we can than calculate the whole cost. But if the object is the mere spending of money in one locality, what better way of doing it can there be than this to get us involved in an expenditure extending over 1,500 miles of distance, with apparently no other purpose than to continue it until it reaches an enormous sum?

I am well aware that the public mind is filled with that old idea of the great highway of commerce. It is astonishing how this mouth-filling language doth beguile the people. Let us sit down and look at it with sense in our heads and light in our eyes, and ask ourselves if we are willing year after year to incur the opprobrium of the country by adding this sum to our bill without any more proof of its righteousness and its wisdom. Let us cut loose this great question from the general river and harbor appropriation bill and let it stand upon its own merits—it is big enough to do it—if there are merits in it. Surely this is a wise course. If we still intend to keep it in the general river and harbor bill, let us confine it to an appropriation for a single reach. Let us try the experiment, even though, as my friend from Chicago [Mr. DUNHAM] well says, the grain will want to go the other way. But if you gentlemen think otherwise, and I am bound to yield deference to the judgment of so many of you, let us see if the experiment we are undertaking is going to be a success, and not throw money away on an uncertainty. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. There are three minutes' time still allowed to the opponents of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT. I wish to ask the chairman about the provision which I find in the bill (page 6, line 128) by which it appears that a marine hospital in the State of Pennsylvania is to be ceded to the United States. I did not know that a marine hospital was part of the river and harbor bill; but I suppose the chairman can explain the nature of this provision.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman would read it over just once more I do not think he would ask the question. It is not a ceding of a marine hospital, but it is a provision to obtain from the marine hospital at Erie the title to the peninsula of Presque Isle, in order that the Government may own the property that it is improving.

Mr. HEWITT. Is not this part of a scheme that has been several times before the House, by which the whole of that property is to be ceded to the United States?

Mr. WILLIS. Not that I know of.

Mr. HEWITT. Does the gentleman know that it is not?

Mr. WILLIS. I know nothing about it except what I state. The Government is asked to improve that part of the navigable water in front of Erie, and before doing so it was thought prudent that the marine hospital, which was said to have certain rights there, should be required to surrender them.

Mr. HEWITT. I have risen for the purpose of giving notice to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that when this item is reached I hope he will be prepared to give the House some explanation of this provision, by which the United States is to come into possession of a certain marine hospital under an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. I think it is an old friend which comes up again in a new form.

Mr. WILLIS. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for general debate has expired. The bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk, reading the bill by paragraphs, read as follows:

Improving harbor at York, Me.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

An amendment reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, striking out the words "continuing improvement," was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that this bill can not be completed to-day, and I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether he is willing that the committee shall now rise.

Mr. WILLIS. We are willing to hold on as long as the Committee of the Whole is disposed to continue the consideration of the bill, but if it is the general desire, I shall not object to the committee now rising.

Several MEMBERS. Rise! Rise!

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, before making the motion, however, I will ask leave to have printed in the RECORD the report of the committee upon this bill, as the supply seems to be exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

Mr. WILLIS, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 7480:

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors beg leave to report back to the House the accompanying bill (H. R. 7480) "making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," with sundry amendments, and to recommend the passage of the same.

The last river and harbor act, which was passed 5th July, 1884, as it left the House appropriated $12,619,100, upon estimates by the engineers that $35,301,885 could be "profitably expended in the fiscal year," or 33⅓ per cent. of the estimates. The bill reported herewith appropriates $15,120,700, upon the engineers' estimates of $42,332,100.

PRINCIPAL ITEMS OF THE BILL.

The following is an itemized statement of the appropriations recommended in this bill:

165 rivers	$9,922,700
124 harbors	4,380,500
5 channels and inlets	262,500
2 ice-harbors	35,000
5 breakwaters	215,500
4 special surveys	139,500
1 dry-dock	65,000
Examinations, surveys, and contingencies	100,000
	15,120,700

Of this total amount the sum of $1,018,000 covers items not carried upon the Book of Estimates. Deducting this last sum from the total, as given above, leaves $14,102,700 as the amount appropriated upon the regular estimates, which is less than 33⅓ per cent. thereof.

NUMBER OF ITEMS REJECTED—NEW ITEMS.

The estimates called for appropriations for 201 rivers (including 8 channels and inlets). Of these the committee rejected 40. They also called for appropriations for 138 harbors (including 5 breakwaters and 2 ice-harbors). Of these the committee rejected 15. Thus, out of a total of 339 items for which appropriations were asked by the engineers, 55 have been refused by the committee. The principal new item is an appropriation of $250,000 for the construction of a new lock on the Saint Mary's River, which is the outlet for the great lake system. The immense increase of commerce on the lakes and the increased draught of vessels passing through this river fully justify the proposed work.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND ESTIMATES.

The largest appropriation in the bill is for the Mississippi River. The committee have appropriated to that river, from its mouth to its source, $3,725,000. This amount includes $50,000 for the reservoirs at its headwaters. An itemization of this aggregate sum is as follows:

Reservoirs at headwaters	$50,000
Snag-boat on Upper Mississippi	30,000
From Saint Paul to Des Moines Rapids	510,000
At Des Moines Rapids, to complete modified project	35,000
From Des Moines Rapids to mouth of Illinois River	200,000

From mouth of Illinois River to mouth of Ohio River	500,000
From Cairo to the Head Passes, including Red River at and below the head of the Atchafalaya	2,250,000
Survey of Mississippi River between Head Passes and headwaters	75,000
To remove obstructions, &c	75,000
Total	3,725,000

The estimates for above items were as follows:

Reservoirs at headwaters	150,000
Snag-boat on Upper Mississippi	30,000
From Saint Paul to Des Moines Rapids	1,500,000
At Des Moines Rapids, to complete modified project	101,700
From Des Moines Rapids to mouth of Illinois River	500,000
From mouth of Illinois River to mouth of Ohio River	1,000,000
From Cairo to the Head Passes, including Red River at and below the head of the Atchafalaya	5,000,000
Survey of Mississippi River, between Head Passes and headwaters	100,000
To remove obstructions, &c	161,000
Total	8,542,700

In addition to the Mississippi, other great rivers in the country receive the following amounts:

Missouri River	$610,000
Ohio River	500,000
Columbia River	460,000
Saint Mary's River and Hay Lake Channel	400,000
Tennessee River	357,500
Kentucky River	250,000
Delaware River	240,000
James River	150,000
Great Kanawha River	150,000
Cape Fear River	125,000
Monongahela River	121,500
Cumberland River	112,500
Illinois River	100,000
Red River	95,000
Arkansas River	75,000
Fox River	75,000
	3,831,500

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR SMALLER RIVERS.

There are in the present bill recommendations for other rivers, as follows.

20 at $5,000 each	$100,000
18 at $10,000 each	180,000
7 at $15,000 each	105,000
30 between $20,000 and $50,000	887,500
2 at $50,000	100,000
	1,372,500

APPROPRIATIONS FOR HARBORS AS RECOMMENDED IN THE BILL.

For harbors, &c., the recommendations of the bill are as follows:

2 ice-harbors, at	$35,000
5 breakwaters, at	215,500
124 harbors, at	4,380,500
	4,631,000

The following are the leading appropriations for harbors:

New York Harbor (Hell Gate, &c.)	$435,000
Galveston Harbor	400,000
Sabine Pass, Texas	265,000
Charleston Harbor	250,000
Mobile Harbor	120,000
Baltimore Harbor	100,000
Norfolk Harbor	150,000
Cumberland Sound	150,000
Toledo Harbor	150,000
Savannah Harbor	125,000
Cleveland Harbor	125,000
Chicago Harbor	100,000
Aransas Pass	135,000
Sand Beach Harbor	100,000
Humboldt Harbor	100,000
Total for fifteen harbors	2,705,000

The following harbors are recommended for appropriations ranging from $50,000 to $100,000:

Oswego	$95,000
Milwaukee	80,000
Oakland	80,000
Yaquina Bay	80,000
Wilmington	75,000
Boston	75,000
Newburyport	50,000
Erie	50,000
Pass Cavallo	50,000
Brazos Santiago	50,000
Duluth	50,000
Total amount for eleven harbors	735,000

In addition to the above there are fifteen harbors, for which recommendations have been made, ranging between $20,000 and $50,000, amounting in the aggregate to $420,000.

SUMMARY OF HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Fifteen harbors, at $100,000 and upward	$2,705,000
Eleven harbors, from $50,000 to $100,000	735,000
Fifteen harbors, at and above $20,000	420,000

TWO RIVER AND HARBOR BILLS IN ONE.

Your committee think it proper to call attention to the fact that the present bill carries appropriations for two years. The last appropriation for rivers and harbors was by the act of July 5, 1884, which was for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. In the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress the Committee on Rivers and Harbors reported a bill recommending the appropriation of $12,323,700. This bill was discussed for several weeks, when another bill, appropriating $5,000,000, was substituted for it and passed the House, but failed in the Senate from want of time to consider it. The deliberate judgment of the representatives of the people was thus placed upon record that at least $5,000,000 was actually needed "for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886."

The failure to secure this or any amount for such purposes excited great complaint, and when this committee commenced their work at the beginning of the present session they were confronted with numerous demands for immediate appropriations. The committee did not think it proper to yield to these demands, but they embrace in the present bill the total amount to be expended for the next fiscal year. The failure of the last House to make any appropriation has thrown on your committee the duty of combining two river and harbor bills in one.

Dividing the present amount recommended between the two fiscal years will give $7,500,000 as the amount of the present bill properly chargeable to this Congress.

No appropriation has been made for the improvement of the Potomac River and flats for the reason that the title to the reclaimed land is in dispute; and, until some satisfactory information on that subject has been furnished, it was not thought prudent to expend money in that direction.

GENERAL LEGISLATION.

The general legislation of the bill is confined to three or four provisions, touching the control, administration, use, and navigation of rivers and harbors. A report is required as to locks and dams now improved under authority, upon which tolls are charged, and as to the advisability of purchasing said improvements by the Government; and in one instance, that of the Monongahela River, the Government is authorized, if necessary, to acquire by condemnation the works of the Monongahela Navigation Company, to the end that the navigation of the river may be made free.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS AND THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

The report of the Mississippi River Commission, together with the annual report and maps of the Chief of Engineers, are required to be made on or before the 1st of December in each year. In the annual report of the Chief of Engineers he is directed to report—

"All the instances in which piers, breakwaters, or other structures or works, built or made by the United States in aid of commerce or navigation, are used, occupied, or injured by a corporation or an individual, and the extent and mode of such use, occupation, or injury, and the facts touching the same. He shall also report whether any bridges, causeways, or structures, now erected or in process of erection, do or will interfere with the free and safe navigation of the rivers and other public works herein appropriated for, and if they do or will so interfere, to report the best mode of altering or constructing such bridges or causeways as to prevent any such obstructions."

CONTRACT SYSTEM PERMISSIBLE.

Another provision makes it the—

"Duty of the Secretary of War to apply the money herein appropriated for improvements, other than surveys and estimates, in carrying on the various works, by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government. Where said works are done by contract, such contract shall be made after sufficient public advertisement for proposals, in such manner and form as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and such contract shall be made with the lowest responsible bidders, accompanied by such securities as the Secretary of War shall require, conditioned for the faithful prosecution and completion of the work according to such contract, and for the prompt payment of all liabilities incurred in the prosecution thereof for labor and material."

OBSTRUCTING BRIDGES AND CAUSEWAYS.

Your committee have also recommended legislation touching the removal of bridges, causeways, and other structures which interfere with the free and convenient navigation of rivers and harbors, and providing that hereafter the drawings and description of such proposed works shall first be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval.

SURVEYS AND EXAMINATIONS.

Your committee have directed the Secretary of War, at his discretion, to cause examinations or surveys, or both, and estimates of costs of improvement proper, to be made of fifty-six rivers and twenty-eight harbors. The wise provision of the act, placing these examinations and surveys under the supervision of the Secretary of War, and prescribing the conditions precedent therefor, have been adopted and made fuller and more specific in the present bill.

Before any money is ordered the local engineer is required to make a preliminary examination, and report to the Chief of Engineers—

"Whether, in his opinion, said river or harbor is worthy of improvement, and shall state in such report fully and particularly the facts and reasons on which he bases such opinion, including the present and prospective demands of commerce; and it shall be the duty of the Chief of Engineers to direct the making of such survey, if in his opinion the river or harbor proposed to be surveyed be worthy of improvement by the General Government, and he shall report to the Secretary of War the facts, and what public necessity or convenience may be subserved thereby, together with the full reports of the local engineer."

Such reports will place Congress in possession of all the facts, and prevent either partiality or prejudice.

Your committee finally recommend that such reports of preliminary examinations and surveys shall be made to this House and shall be printed. At present these reports are sent to the Senate, and the committee primarily charged with their consideration are thus frequently deprived of important and necessary information.

Your committee confidently believe that Congress will adopt these several legislative recommendations, as they are all approved by the Engineer Department, and have for their sole object the honest, faithful, and economical administration of the public moneys, and the proper regulation, maintenance, and construction of those great public works whose importance to commerce and navigation has been recognized from the foundation of our Government.

CONCLUSION.

Your committee, in bringing this report to a conclusion, can not refrain from briefly referring to the unusual and embarrassing circumstances under which the bill now reported was framed, and the efforts which they have made to discharge acceptably the arduous and responsible duties devolved upon them. The fact, already alluded to, that two river and harbor bills are embraced in the present bill, will suggest the increased responsibility, difficulty, and embarrassment in apportioning this small amount among a large number of works of improvement equally meritorious and important.

In discharging this duty your committee have availed themselves of all the information within their reach. Not only have the committee twice carefully considered all the facts contained in the special and general reports of the War Department, but every Member and Delegate was invited to appear, and over nine-tenths of them did appear and present additional facts touching the improvements within their respective districts. Numerous delegations, representing different works, were also heard.

Conscious that in the investigation of so many hundred public works, new and old, they may have in some instances done injustice, but trusting that in the main the conclusions arrived at will be found to be correct, the committee submit this bill as the result of their labors, with the hope that it will meet with the approval of Congress and of the country.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN, from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RELATIONS OF LABOR AND CAPITAL.

The SPEAKER announced the following-named members as the Select Committee to investigate the causes of the existing disturbed condition of the relations between railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce and their employés in certain States:

A. G. CURTIN, of Pennsylvania; J. N. BURNES, of Missouri; W. H. CRAIN, of Texas; J. H. OUTHWAITE, of Ohio; J. W. STEWART, of Vermont; A. X. PARKER, of New York; and JAMES BUCHANAN, of New Jersey.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, at the request of a number of gentlemen, I ask unanimous consent for any member who desires to print in the RECORD remarks on the river and harbor bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. J. W. STEWART, for one week, from this date, on account of important business.

To Mr. TURNER, indefinitely.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KING moved that the House adjourn, but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. GAY.

ALTARS ADMITTED FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. GAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill No. 4007 and put it upon its passage. It will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to admit free of import duty, at the custom-house in New Orleans, La., a set of altars for the Catholic church of Saint John the Evangelist, of the parish of La Fayette, imported by Rev. Ernest Forge, priest of said church, and M. T. Martin, P. Gerard, and Louis Gus Breaux, trustees of said church, and consigned to J. Nugrule, of New Orleans, La.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GAY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTORAL COUNT BILL.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, when I reported the electoral count bill I forgot to ask leave that the views of the minority might be printed with the report of the committee. I now make that request.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 16, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. 444) to amend section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 7465) to amend section 3357 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 2 of the act of June 9, 1880, and section 3389 of said Revised Statutes as amended by section 16 of the act of March, 1879.

The bill (H. R. 5789) to amend section 2552 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 6637) relating to contested elections, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade and Transportation of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at Cairo, Ill., as contemplated by Sennate bill 1718 and House bill 6047; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Georgetown and Lynn, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of citizens of Lewiston, Idaho, praying for the annexation of Northern Idaho to Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Tariffville, Hartford County, Connecticut, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Bath, Me., praying that liberal appropriations be made for public works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction by the Government of a harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, Rockport, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRIS presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Madison County, Tennessee, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Atlantic, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania praying for the adoption of a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COKE. I present a petition signed by ten or twelve colored people of Groveton, Trinity County, Texas, praying for the passage of a bill appropriating not exceeding $100 per capita, to be expended under the direction of the American Colonization Society, in paying the expenses of emigrants to Liberia and in providing there six months' shelter and support of themselves and children. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of citizens of Sidney Plains, N. Y., praying for the passage of a law taxing imitations of butter; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal and other internal improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of 167 Knights of Labor of Coldwater; a memorial of 70 Knights of Labor of Ionia, and a memorial of 117 Knights of Labor of Mount Clemens, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating agaist the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of 450 Knights of Labor of Springfield, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for the passage of a bill providing for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Kirwin, Kans., praying that the Government purchase or construct an experimental double-track railroad from the city of New York to Kansas City, Mo.; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wyandotte County, Kansas, praying for the passage of a bill embodying the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of William H. F. Lee, of Fairfax County, Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4670) granting to the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, the right to construct a bridge across Young's Bay, a navigable stream in said county and State, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HARRIS. For the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who is now absent, and in his name, I report from that committee the bill (S. 851) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company with amendments, and I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 762) to prevent obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York city, by dumping or otherwise, and to punish and prevent such offenses, and making other provisions in connection therewith, reported a bill (S. 2157) to prevent obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York city, by dumping or otherwise, and to punish and prevent such offenses, and making other provisions in connection therewith; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6661) to provide for closing up the business and paying the expenses of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BROWN. The Committee on the District of Columbia has had under consideration the bill (S. 1617) to incorporate the Union Passenger Railway Company of Washington, D. C. The question has been referred by the committee to the commissioners of the District, who say that the contemplated route is located in a section already very well supplied with street-railroad facilities, and the commissioners are unaware of any general demand of the residents along the line of it or elsewhere for the additional accommodation this road might afford. The commissioners say they are satisfied "that the establishment of the road proposed in the bill would not materially improve the public-conveyance service already existing, while it would greatly add to the public inconvenience along streets where there are now no railroads. There was also a strong protest sent to the committee by citizens residing upon C street against the construction of the road upon that street on account of the narrowness of the street.

The committee therefore report the bill back and recommend that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1909) for the relief of W. H. Ward, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to; and he submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 2158) for the relief of W. H. Ward; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1047) for the relief of Patrick H. Estes, a veteran invalid soldier of the Mexican war, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

JOHN RANDOLPH HAMILTON.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am authorized by the Committee on the Judiciary to report an original bill for the relief of John Randolph Hamilton, of North Carolina, from his political disabilities. He has filed a proper petition; it is found that he is not indebted to the United States; and according to our custom in such cases, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2156) for the relief of John Randolph Hamilton, of the State of North Carolina.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed; two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

JOHN TAYLOR WOOD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also authorized by the Committee on the Judiciary to report favorably the bill (H. R. 5198) to remove the disabilities of John Taylor Wood, of Louisiana, and I ask unanimous consent that it be now considered. There is a proper petition, and the gentleman is not indebted to the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed; two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

DINWIDDIE B. PHILLIPS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report favorably the bill (H. R. 5876) for the relief of Dinwiddie B. Phillips, in respect of whom there is a petition, and he is not indebted to the United States. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed; two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report also the bill (S. 1285) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. It is not a political disability bill, but is one in reference to a military disability, and I think it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. The bill relates to an appointment in the Marine-Hospital Service and not in the Army service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an Army provision. Otherwise he would be eligible to the Marine-Hospital Service if it is not a military appointment or a naval one.

Mr. CONGER. He has been serving in the Marine-Hospital Service, and the objection arose in that service. That matter is in charge of the Committee on Commerce, though I have no objection to the proposed reference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But he wants to be appointed in the regular Army, and it comes under the Army provision; it does not touch the Marine-Hospital Service at all.

Mr. CONGER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EDWARD G. W. BUTLER.

Mr. EDMUNDS. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report adversely the bill (S. 1220) for the relief of Edward G. W. Butler from political disabilities, and I ask that it be indefinitely postponed, for the reason that we have already at this session passed a House bill for his relief.

The report was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLATT. I introduce a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Almira Ambler, a volunteer nurse.

The bill (S. 2159) granting a pension to Mrs. Almira Ambler was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2160) granting a pension to Mary J. Hagerman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 2161) to increase the pension of Mrs. Rebecca A. Craw; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 2162) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2163) granting a pension to Powhatan B. Short; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 2164) making an appropriation for the improvement of the Missouri River at or near Eastport, opposite Nebraska City, and at Plattsmouth and at Omaha; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2165) for the relief of David Ryan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2166) for the relief of John F. Cadwallader; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 2167) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Dunlap; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2168) for the rewarding of Chief Engineer George W. Melville, United States Navy, for meritorious services, &c.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 2169) in relation to Indian depredations; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH. I intend this bill to accompany Senate bill 1820 introduced by me, and I ask that it be laid on the table until after the remarks I propose to submit this morning. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall move to refer the bill to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 2170) to increase the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth A. Barbour; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 61) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect at Stony Point, N. Y., a monument; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. DAWES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, providing an appropriation of $100,000 for continuing improvement of the national harbor of refuge of the first class at Sandy Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Henry D. Coley be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims, under the rules of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CALL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of H. Myers, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, there being no adverse report.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. BECK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Mr. JAMES Z. GEORGE be, and he hereby is, appointed a member of the Committee on the Judiciary in place of Mr. Howell E. Jackson, resigned.

ALLEN'S REPORT ON ALASKA.

Mr. BECK submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the official report by Lieut. Henry T. Allen, Second United States Cavalry, of his exploration of the Copper, Tarona, and Koyukuk Rivers, of Alaska, in the year 1885, for reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BECK. I desire to have the resolution passed now, so that the report may be referred to the Committee on Printing when it is received. It is the report of a very wonderful exploration, I think.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 15th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 44) providing for the erection of a public building at San Antonio, Tex.;

An act (S. 197) to increase the pension of Florence Murray;

An act (S. 683) granting a pension to Henry O. Hill;

An act (S. 811) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan Gilman;

An act (S. 814) granting a pension to Mrs. Adaline M. Putnam;

An act (S. 1363) granting a pension to William Blanchard;

An act (S. 60) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes; and

An act (S. 1127) to amend and correct the act approved March 3, 1885, granting a pension to Sarah Hague.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOLPH. May I say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. Some weeks since I introduced a bill, and last Tuesday I gave notice that I should desire to address the Senate to-day upon it. It relates to what I consider a very important matter——

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say at once to the Senator from Oregon that I was not aware his notice was for this morning, and that as a matter of course I would be guilty of no discourtesy; and so I yield to the right of the Senator to make his remarks.

Mr. DOLPH. I am much obliged for the courtesy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What motion does the Senator from Oregon make?

Mr. DOLPH. I move to take up now for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it the bill introduced by me this morning in connection with the one heretofore introduced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2169) in relation to Indian depredations.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The motion is to take up the bill, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to take up the bill named.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is a motion to take up in the morning hour a bill pending on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. I gave notice——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have a notice pending here which antedates any other that can possibly be given.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will allow me a moment I will state that my object simply is to take up the bill for the purpose of submitting some remarks—a courtesy always accorded to any member of the Senate when notice has been given.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That notice was given this morning. I gave a notice four months ago nearly, and I find that there is every kind of endeavor made here to defeat the resolution for open executive sessions.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I inquire who has the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. He made a motion to take up a bill, and I am answering that motion. May I not do so?

Mr. DOLPH. I gave notice last Tuesday that after the conclusion of the morning business this morning I should ask leave to submit some remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. That motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The question is on agreeing to the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRYE. The question is on a motion to take up the bill referred to by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, simply for the purpose of allowing the Senator to make some remarks, of which he gave notice.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. And to take it up in the morning hour and defeat by indirection the resolution which I am trying to bring to a vote.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MILLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], but as this is not a political question I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. May I ask the Chair whether a motion to reconsider would be debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not be debatable under the rule.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. My purpose was to change my vote and make such a motion if it were debatable.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nay 1; as follows:

YEAS—43.

Allison,	Conger,	Harrison.	Pugh,
Beck,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Sewell,

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to make a motion to adjourn to Monday?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill called up by the Senator from Oregon is now before the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. As I desire to refer to Senate bill 1820 I ask to have it read as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the Indian depredation claims which have been heretofore filed and investigated under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and reported by him to Congress, in pursuance of the laws of Congress and in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DOLPH. I now ask to have read the bill which I introduced this morning concerning Indian depredations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. 2169) in relation to Indian depredations, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Court of Claims shall have power to hear and determine all claims for depredations committed by Indians embraced within the terms of section 2156 of the Revised Statutes, whether the said claims have been heretofore presented to the Interior Department or Congress, or not.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior, or the Secretary of the Senate, or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be, shall immediately after the passage of this act transmit to the Court of Claims for adjudication all claims for Indian depredations heretofore presented to the Interior Department or to Congress, with all vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, and upon the presentation of a petition on behalf of any claimant within the time hereinafter limited the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as said court may adopt.

SEC. 3. That the Attorney-General, or his assistants under his direction, shall appear therein to defend the United States and the Indians in all such actions, with the same power to interpose counter-claims, offsets, defenses for fraud, and other defenses as now given in said court.

SEC. 4. That the same right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States existing in other cases in the Court of Claims shall exist in the cases considered under this act.

SEC. 5. That no person shall be excluded from testifying in cases under this act on account of being a party or interested; and the affidavits and other evidence heretofore filed in Congress or in the Departments in such cases may be considered by said court, and such weight shall be given to such evidence as the court may deem proper.

SEC. 6. That the Court of Claims shall in every judgment rendered under this act find the tribe of Indians by which, or by members of which, the depredation was committed, and whether annuities or other funds are due to said tribe from the United States.

SEC. 7. That the amount of any judgment so rendered shall be charged against the tribes by which, or by members of which, the court shall find that the depredation was committed, and shall be deducted and paid in the following manner: First. From any annuities due said tribe from the United States. Secondly. If no annuities are due or available from any other funds due said tribe from the United States arising from the sale of their lands or otherwise. Thirdly. If no such funds are due or available from any appropriations for the benefit of said tribe, other than appropriations for their current and necessary support, subsistence, and education; and Fourthly. If no such annuity fund or appropriation is due or available, the amount of the judgment shall be paid from the public Treasury: Provided, That any amount so paid from the public Treasury shall remain a charge against such tribe and shall be deducted from any annuity, fund, or appropriation hereinbefore designated which may hereafter become due from the United States to such tribe.

SEC. 8. That in all said claims which have arisen prior to the passage of this act, whether heretofore presented or not, a petition on behalf of the claimant shall be presented to the court within three years from the date hereof, and not thereafter; and in all such claims arising less than six years prior to the date hereof, or which may hereafter arise, such a petition shall be so presented within six years from the date of such depredation, and not thereafter; and all claims for Indian depredations not so presented within the time limited by this section shall be forever barred, and shall not be considered by any Department of the Government.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, by the two bills just read it is designed to provide for the adjudication and payment of that class of claims against the Government, known as Indian depredation claims. By the first of these bills an appropriation is proposed for the payment of all such claims as have been duly presented to the Interior Department, examined and approved and reported to Congress, and by the second it is proposed to provide for claimants whose claims for any reason have not been so examined and approved, a tribunal to which such claims can be presented and adjudicated according to law and the rules and practice of the court.

On the 16th day of January, 1884, I introduced and had referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of the United States in Oregon, Washington and Idaho Territories, and in Northern California, by reason of Indian depredations committed during the period from 1855 to 1878 inclusive. The bill provided in substance for the appointment of three commissioners to inquire into the extent and character of such depredations and the description and value of the property destroyed or carried away and the damage sustained by citizens by reason thereof; and it also further provided the manner in which testimony should be taken, and such claims should be examined and reported by the commissioners to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, and by him to the Secretary of the Treasury to be transmitted to Congress for an appropriation. That bill and a number of private bills for the relief of citizens for losses sustained by such depredations, introduced by me at the same session, were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but none of them were ever reported.

Being desirous of presenting to the committee and to the Senate the reasons which, in my judgment, require that such claims should be paid without further delay, and fearing that if the bills which have just been read shall be first referred to the committee they will share the fate of those on the same subject, heretofore introduced by me and referred to the committee, I have concluded to address the Senate upon them before they are referred.

The civil status of the Indians in the United States has always been an anomaly. From an early period in the history of the Government the Indian tribes were treated in a degree as political bodies, and as possessing some of the functions of nationality, but as neither foreign nor domestic nations. Congress, however, by an act approved March 3, 1871, provided that thereafter no recognition by treaty or otherwise should be made by the United States of the claim of any Indian tribe as being an independent nation, tribe, or power. In the articles of confederation it was declared that "the United States in Congress assembled have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the trade and managing all the affairs with the Indians not members of the States."

Under this provision Congress issued a proclamation September 22, 1783, prohibiting and forbidding all persons from making settlements on lands inhabited or claimed by Indians within the limits or jurisdiction of any State, and from purchasing or receiving any gift or cession of such lands or claims without the authority of Congress, and declaring every such unauthorized settlement, purchase, or cession null and void. It has been settled by decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of the country that the Indian tribes are not the owners of the Territories occupied by them, but that the title to the same is in the United States, subject to the right of occupancy by the Indians, and that such tribes are incompetent to transfer any rights to the soil, and that any conveyances of their lands by them are void ab initio, the right to the property not subsisting in the grantor; that the General Government holds the right of eminent domain as well as the title to the soil in the public lands subject to the right of occupancy by the Indians, and that, as was said by Chief-Justice Marshall, in Johnson vs. McIntosh, 8 Wheaton, 543, "The Indian inhabitants are considered merely as occupants to be protected while in peace in the possession of their lands, but incapable of transferring an absolute title to others."

Acting upon this theory, the Government has never surveyed, sold, or disposed of the public lands prior to the extinguishment of the Indian right of occupancy, but has proceeded from time to time to terminate the occupancy of the Indians as the lands were needed for settlement, by conquest or purchase; and since the act of March 3, 1871, keeps up the form of purchase of the right of occupancy, although not recognizing the Indian tribes as independent powers, and although the Indians are treated in all other respects as mere wards of the Government. The more sensible and consistent position under existing laws would be to treat the right of occupancy as a privilege only, which the Government may withdraw when the interests of civilization and of such wards, in the opinion of the guardian, may demand it. Having assumed the absolute control of the Indians and treated them as personal wards, the Government should assume as absolute a control of their property and not permit the want of their consent to stand in the way of a disposition thereof, which, in the opinion of Congress, would be for their benefit.

The Indians in the United States are now, and have been for years upon reservations, the boundaries of which have been fixed by the Government and which are in charge of agents appointed by it and are maintained to a great extent by annual appropriations from the Federal Treasury. Congress under the Constitution has power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, and under this power the United States has at all times exercised the exclusive control of the trade and intercourse with the Indians, and no one has ever been permitted to deal with them except under license from it. The first act regulating trade and commerce with the Indians was passed May 19, 1796 (1. Statutes, 469). Section 14 of this act was as follows:

And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States, shall come over or across the said boundary line into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, or shall commit any murder, violence, or outrage upon any such citizen or inhabitant, it shall be the duty of such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, to make application to the superintendent, or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize for that purpose; who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction or instruction of the President of the United States, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian or Indians shall belong, for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding eighteen months, then it shall be the duty of such superintendent or other person authorized, as aforesaid, to make return of his doings to the President of the United States, and forward to him all documents and proofs in the case, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury. And in the mean time in respect to the property taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guarantees to the party injured an eventual indemnification: Provided always, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall, in any way, violate any of the provisions of this act, by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, by crossing over the line on any of the Indian lands, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension or arresting within the limits of any State or district of any Indian having so offended: And provided further, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to deduct such sum or sums as shall be paid for the property taken, stolen, or destroyed by any such Indian, out of the annual stipend which the United States are bound to pay to the tribe to which such Indian shall belong.

This section was substantially re-enacted in the act of March 3, 1779 (1 Statutes, 747), in the act of March 30, 1802 (2 Statutes, 143), and in the act of June 30, 1834 (4 Statutes, 731). The changes from the original section made by the acts of 1779 and 1802 were merely verbal, and all of the acts contained the following clause, quoted from the act of June 30, 1834:

And, in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, he United States guarantee to the person injured an eventual indemnification.

And the act of 1834 contained the following provision:

And if the nation or tribe to which such Indian may belong receive an annuity from the United States, such claim shall, at the next payment of the annuity, be deducted therefrom and paid to the party injured; and if no annuity is payable to such nation or tribe, then the amount of the claim shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States.

These provisions of the act of 1834 remained in force, and claims for losses from Indian depredations were paid by the United States in accordance therewith until the passage of the act of February 28, 1859, section 8 of which repealed the provision for the payment of these claims from the Treasury, and was in the following words:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834, as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases by Indians trespassing on white men, as described in the said act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair or destroy the obligation of the Indians to make indemnification out of the annuities as prescribed in said act.

By joint resolution passed June 25, 1860 (12 Statutes, 120), it was provided:

That the repeal by the eighth section of the act of Congress approved the 28th day of February, 1859, of so much of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834, as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases by Indians trespassing on white men, as described in said act, shall not be construed to destroy or impair any right to indemnity which existed at the date of said repeal.

Claims for Indian depredations, arising prior to February 28, 1859, were therefore paid out of the Treasury, if there were no annuities payable to the tribes committing the depredations from which they could have been paid, and the payment of claims for depredations committed after February 28, 1859, was continued out of annuities due the tribe committing the depredations until the passage of the act of July 15, 1870, section 4 of which (now 2098 of the Revised Statutes) is as follows:

That no part of the moneys appropriated by this act, or which may hereafter be appropriated in any general act or deficiency bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department to pay annuities due, or to be used and expended for the care and benefit of any tribe or tribes of Indians named herein, shall be applied to the payment of any claim for depredations that may have been or may be committed by such tribe or tribes, or any member or members thereof; and no claim for Indian depredations shall hereafter be paid until Congress shall make special appropriation therefor; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

By an act passed May 29, 1872 (17 Statutes, 190, now section 466 R. S.), the Secretary of the Interior is required to prepare and cause to be published such regulations as he may deem proper, prescribing the manner of presenting claims arising under laws or treaty stipulations for compensation for depredations committed by the Indians, and the degree and character of the evidence necessary to support such claims, and to carefully investigate such claims as may be presented, subject to the regulations prepared by him; and it is provided that "no payment on account of said claims shall be made without a specific appropriation therefor by Congress."

Sections 2156 and 2157 of the Revised Statutes, being a part of the act of June 30, 1834, as modified by the act of February 28, 1859, and of July 15, 1870, provide:

SEC. 2156. If any Indian, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States, shall, within the Indian country, take or destroy the property of any person lawfully within such country, or shall pass from Indian country into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent may make application to the proper superintendent, agent, or subagent, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction of the President, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian shall belong for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, such superintendent, agent, or subagent shall make return of his doings to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper in the opinion of the President to obtain satisfaction for the injury.

SEC. 2157. The superintendents, agents, and subagents within their respective districts are authorized and empowered to take depositions of witnesses touching any depredations within the purview of the preceding sections, and to administer oaths to the deponents.

These sections have remained in force, and numerous claims for Indian depredations have since 1859 been presented to and audited by the Interior Department, notwithstanding the Government had virtually ceased to appropriate money for the payment of the claims thus audited. If it was intended by Congress, by the act of 1859, to repudiate the obligation of the Government to its citizens to indemnify them for such losses it should have said so then, and not have held out to them delusive hopes by continuing to receive proofs of these claims and to audit them under regulations prescribed by its authority.

The claims examined and audited by the Interior Department have been reported at different times to Congress and are contained in the following executive documents, all being letters from the Secretary of the Interior to the House of Representatives:

House Executive Document No. 127, Twenty-fifth Congress, second session.

House Executive Document No. 311, Forty-first Congress, second session.

House Executive Document No. 11, Forty-second Congress, third session.

House Executive Document No. 65, Forty-third Congress, second session.

House Executive Document No. 147, Forty-fourth Congress, first session.

House Executive Document No. 135, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.

House Executive Document No. 10, Forty-seventh Congress, second session.

House Executive Document No. 23, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.

House Executive Document No. 102, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.

House Executive Document No. 132, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.

House Executive Document No. 20, Forty-eighth Congress, second session.

House Executive Document No. 86, Forty-eighth Congress, second session.

House Executive Document No. 182, Forty-eighth Congress, second session.

House Executive Document No. 197, Forty-eighth Congress, second session.

By act of March 3, 1885, the Indian appropriation bill, the sum of $10,000 was appropriated for the investigation of certain Indian depredation claims, and it is provided in said act that "in expending said sum the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be made a complete list of all claims heretofore filed in the Interior Department and which have been approved in whole or in part, and now remain unpaid; and also such claims as are pending, but not yet examined, on behalf of citizens of the United States on account of depredations committed chargeable against any tribe of Indians by reason of any treaty between such tribe and the United States, including the name and address of the claimants," &c.

The first clause of this provision is construed by the Interior Department to comprehend all claims for Indian depredations, without reference to treaty obligations, which had been approved in whole or in part, and were unpaid and on file in this Department at the date of the passage of the act.

The latter clause is construed to comprehend, and to require the examination of such unexamined claims in favor of citizens of the United States, on account of Indian depredations as were pending at the passage of the act, and which are chargeable to Indians who were in amity with the United States and bound by treaty obligations to make satisfaction therefor.

So that unintentionally, probably, Congress has, in the claims directed to be reported, made a distinction between claims of the same class, filed under the same law, and audited under the same regulations of the Interior Department, by requiring those only which had been approved before the passage of the act, to be reported in cases in which they are not chargeable to the Indians under treaty stipulations.

By House Executive Document No. 125, being a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, dated March 11, 1886, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, there was transmitted a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs made in pursuance of said act of March 3, 1885, containing a list of about forty-five hundred claims, approximating in amount, as is stated in the report, to about $15,000,000. Some idea of the magnitude of the question of the adjudication and payment of these claims can be obtained by an inspection of this report which I hold in my hand.

The list of claims with alphabetical indexes makes a volume of two hundred and ninety pages. Most of the claims which appear in this report have been heretofore reported to Congress from year to year by the Secretary of the Interior in his annual reports of depredation claims audited and allowed under the provisions of the Revised Statutes, and still the claimants have no assurance of the payment of their claims. We should temporize with this matter no longer. It can be better dealt with now than it ever can be hereafter.

Under the authority conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior by section 466 of the Revised Statutes, there was issued July 13, 1872, by the Department rules and regulations, still in force, of which the following is a copy:

Rules and regulations adopted by the Department of the Interior relative to the presentation and examination of claims on account of depredations committed by Indians.

By the seventh section of the act of Congress making appropriations for the Indian Department, approved May 29, 1872, it is enacted: "That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to prepare and cause to be published such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper, prescribing the manner of presenting claims arising under existing laws or treaty stipulations, for compensation for depredations committed by the Indians, and the degree and character of the evidence necessary to support such claims; he shall carefully investigate all such claims as may be presented, subject to the rules and regulations prepared by him, and report to Congress, at each session thereof, the nature, character, and amount of such claims, whether allowed by him or not, and the evidence upon which his action was based: Provided, That no payment on account of said claim shall be made without a specific appropriation by Congress."

In compliance with the requirement of the law as quoted above the following rules and regulations are prescribed:

1. Application for indemnity or satisfaction for the loss or injury sustained must be made by the claimant, his attorney or duly authorized agent, * * * to the United States * * * Indian agent, or subagent within whose jurisdiction or charge the nation, tribe, or band is to which the offenders or depredators belong.

2. The necessary documents and proofs must accompany the application of the claimant, his attorney, or agent, and should be in legal form, and consist—

First. Of the sworn declaration of the claimant, setting forth when and where the depredation was committed, and by what Indians, their tribe or nation being named; describing fully the property stolen or destroyed, and giving the quantity of each article or number, condition or quality thereof, and the just value of each article or piece of property at the time the same was so taken or destroyed. Should the depredation have been committed while the claimant was in the Indian country, he must state whether he was lawfully there, either having a license to trade with the Indians, a passport, or a permit from the proper Indian authorities, or was en route through said country to a place of ultimate destination at some point within the limits of any State or Territory not included within the limits of the reservation for any nation or tribe of Indians set apart by treaty provision or by executive order; and he in such declaration must further state whether any of the property so stolen or destroyed has subsequently been recovered by or for him, the claimant; and whether the claimant has at any time received part compensation therefor, and, if so, how much, when, and from what source; and further, that the claimant has in no way endeavored to obtain private satisfaction or revenge.

Second. Of depositions of two or more persons having personal cognizance of the facts or any of them as embraced in the declaration of the claimant, which depositions must set forth the means of knowledge which deponents have as to the fact of the depredation, when, where, by what Indians, and under what circumstances the depredation was committed, of what the property consisted that was so taken or destroyed by the Indians, describing it as fully as practicable, and stating the value thereof. If the deponents, or any of them, were at the time of the depredation in the employment of the claimant it must be so stated, and in what capacity. In addition to the foregoing the claimant must show, by his own evidence or that of other persons, that at the time the depredation was committed the property then stolen or destroyed was being properly guarded and cared for, and that the loss thereof was not occasioned by the negligence or carelessness of himself or employés.

3. The testimony adduced by the claimant must be taken before some officer authorized by law to administer oaths, or it may be taken before the proper * * * Indian agent, or subagent. If taken before a justice of the peace, the official character of that person should be certified by some proper officer empowered thereunto. All interlineations or changes that it may be necessary to make in the testimony of any person testifying in behalf of the claimant, either before or at the signing of the same, must be duly attested by the officer before whom the testimony is sworn to and subscribed.

4. When the application, documents, and proofs shall have been received by the * * * Indian agent, or subagent, said officer shall carefully investigate the case; shall ascertain, by inquiry of reliable persons, from advertised prices, or otherwise, whether the prices fixed by the claimant upon the articles of property mentioned in the claim are just and fair as compared with the market prices ruling at the time in the State or Territory in which the depredation was committed, with due allowance for enhancement of price by reason of transportation; and, where it is possible to procure it, said officer shall, if deemed advisable, take testimony as to the credibility of the claimant, or of any person testifying in his behalf; and also respecting the statements set forth in the application, documents, and proofs submitted by the claimant. Upon the performance of this duty, the * * * Indian agent, or subagent, will, without unnecessary delay, present the case to the proper nation or tribe assembled in council, according to the custom of such nation or tribe, and, after fully explaining it to them, he will then and there demand satisfaction for the claimant. If within a reasonable time the nation or tribe shall not have complied with such demand, the fact of the depredation by some of their people being admitted in such council, or if they deny the charge as made and peremptorily refuse to render any satisfaction, the * * * agent, or subagent, will in such case submit a report of the proceedings had, together with all the papers, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Such report shall state whether the Indians in council recognized, remembered, and admitted the depredation charged; and, if so, how far and with what particularity the allegations of the claimant respecting such depredations were borne out by the recollections and acknowledgments of the Indians in reference thereto.

5. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs will cause all claims received by him as above noticed to be duly registered and filed in his office, and shall, as soon thereafter as practicable, cause the same to be carefully examined, and then forwarded, with a report of his views and opinion in each case, to the Secretary of the Interior for the action of the Department.

C. DELANO, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, July 13, 1872.

And under the act of March 3, 1885, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs issued a circular, of which the following is a copy:

[Circular No. 159.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., ——, 188—.

To —— ——,
—— ——,
—— ——:

By an item in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885 (Stats. 23, page 376), the Secretary of the Interior is required to investigate certain depredation claims as therein indicated, and make report thereof to Congress at its next regular session.

The evidence on file in —— depredation claim for $—— is not made in compliance with the rules prescribed by the Department, and is defective and inadequate to satisfactorily establish the claim. Any additional evidence in support of the claim must be submitted immediately, and if none is submitted within —— days the case will be examined, adjudicated, and disposed of upon the testimony now on file and forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior for transmittal to Congress at its next session, as required by law.

All documents and proofs in support of the claim must be in legal form, consisting of:

First. Of the sworn declaration of the claimant, setting forth when and where the depredation was committed, and by what Indians, their tribe or nation being named; describing fully the property stolen or destroyed, and giving the quantity of each article, or number, condition, or quality thereof, and the just value of each article or piece of property at the time the same was so taken or destroyed. Should the depredation have been committed while the claimant was in the Indian country, he must state whether he was lawfully there, either having a license to trade with the Indians, a passport, or a permit from the proper Indian authorities, or was en route through said country to a place of ultimate destination at some point within the limits of any State or Territory not included within the limits of the reservation for any nation or tribe of Indians set apart by treaty provision or by executive order; and he, in such declaration, must further state whether any of the property so stolen or destroyed has subsequently been recovered by or for him, the claimant, and whether the claimant has at any time received part compensation therefor, and, if so, how much, when, and from what source; and further, that the claimant has in no way endeavored to obtain private satisfaction or revenge.

Second. Of depositions of two or more persons having personal cognizance of the facts or any of them, as embraced in the declaration of the claimant, which depositions must set forth the means of knowledge which deponents have as to the fact of the depredation, when, where, by what Indians, and under what circumstances the depredation was committed, what the property consisted of that was so taken or destroyed by the Indians, describing it as fully as practicable, and stating the value thereof. If the deponents, or any of them, were at the time of the depredation in the employment of the claimant, it must be so stated, and in what capacity. In addition to the foregoing, the claimant must show, by his own evidence, or that of other persons, that at the time the depredation was committed the property then stolen or destroyed was being properly guarded and cared for, and that the loss thereof was not occasioned by the negligence or carelessness of himself or employés.

——— ———,
Commissioner.

While the Government is thus, by neglecting to make appropriations, ignoring the claims of its own citizens it is careful to protect the rights of the Indians. Provision is made by law for the recovery from any white person of twice the value of any property of an Indian taken, injured, or destroyed by such white person and for the payment of the just value of such property from the Treasury of the United States if the offender is unable to pay the same or can not be apprehended and brought to trial. These provisions are found in sections 2154 and 2155 of the Revised Statutes, which are as follows:

SEC. 2154. Whenever, in the commission, by a white person, of any crime, offense, or misdemeanor within the Indian country, the property of any friendly Indian is taken, injured, or destroyed, and a conviction is had for such crime, offense, or misdemeanor, the person so convicted shall be sentenced to pay to such friendly Indian to whom the property may belong, or whose person may be injured, a sum equal to twice the just value of the property so taken, injured, or destroyed.

SEC. 2155. If such offender shall be unable to pay a sum at least equal to the just value or amount, whatever such payment shall fall short of the sum shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. If such offender can not be apprehended and brought to trial, the amount of such property shall be paid out of the Treasury. But no Indian shall be entitled to any payment out of the Treasury of the United States, for any such property, if he, or any of the nation to which he belongs, have sought private revenge, or have attempted to obtain satisfaction by any force or violence.

The Committee on Indian Affairs at the present session has reported upon two bills, one (S. 145) for the relief of James Bainter, and the other (S. 146, report No. 130) for the relief of George S. Comstock, upon what appears to me to be a new theory for getting rid of this class of claims. The reports in these two cases are substantially alike. The one in the case of George S. Comstock is as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 146) for relief of George S. Comstock, have considered the same, and in accordance with the views of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, given in the inclosed letter, which is made part of this report, they recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1886.

SIR: I am in receipt, by reference, of your letter of the 6th instant, addressed to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, referring bill (S. 146) for the relief of George S. Comstock, with a request for such information relative thereto as this Department may possess, and in reply I have the honor to report that it appears from the records of this office that a claim of George S. Comstock, amounting to $18,908.53, on account of depredations alleged to have been committed by Cheyenne and Sioux Indians, on the 9th and 10th days of August, 1864, was filed in this office June 22, 1882; on the 8th July following the claim was transmitted to United States Indian Agent McGillycuddy, at Pine Ridge agency, Dakota, with directions to carefully examine all the facts connected therewith, and, after submitting the same to the Indians in council, to report the result, together with his recommendation of allowance or disallowance. Under date of January 21, 1884, Agent McGillycuddy returned the claim with his report, recommending favorable action. On the 2d of February following, the report of this office, recommending an allowance of $12 404.36, to be paid from moneys due Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux of Nebraska, was submitted to the honorable Secretary of this Department, and by him transmitted under date of February 15, 1884, to the Speaker House of Representatives, and appears, by Executive Document No. 102, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, to have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs

The claim was returned to this office for re-examination in pursuance to the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1885, and was again examined and reported to the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, under date of November 30 last, with the recommendation that the claim be dismissed as barred by force of the seventeenth section of the act approved June 30, 1834 (4 Statutes, 731, 732), and the recommendation for disallowance was concurred in by the honorable Secretary, under date of 10th December last.

The papers in the case are now on file in this office. Senate bill 146 is herewith returned.

Respectfully,

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

Hon. H. L. DAWES,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

Section 17 of the act of June 30, 1834, referred to in this report, was what is now section 2156 of the Revised Statutes. It contained the clause by which the United States guaranteed to the party injured by the taking or destroying of his property by Indians an eventual indemnification, and also the following proviso:

Provided, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall in any way violate any of the provisions of this act by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That unless such claim shall be presented within three years after the commission of the injury, the same shall be barred; and if the nation or tribe to which such Indian may belong receive an annuity from the United States, such claim shall at the next payment of the annuity be deducted therefrom and paid to the party injured, and if no annuity is due to such nation or tribe then the amount of the claim shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States.

These provisions for the payment of claims out of the Treasury and out of annuities were repealed by the acts of February 28, 1859, and July 15, 1870. When these provisions were repealed the limitation of the statute, in my judgment, ceased to be of force. After such repeal there could be no payment of such claims without the authority of Congress, and a statute of limitation against Congressional action would be useless. That part of the statute was not, therefore, included in the Revised Statutes, and if in force when the Revised Statutes were enacted was expressly repealed by section 5596. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, however, notwithstanding the claims in question were presented and audited by their predecessors under the rules prescribed by the Interior Department and reported to Congress for its action have, upon re-examination of the claims, discovered, as they supposed, that they are barred by a statute of limitations which originally applied to the payment of claims by the Department without Congressional action and which has long since ceased to be operative, and the Committee on Indian Affairs appears to have adopted the views of the Department.

Since the provisions for the payment of these claims out of the Treasury and out of annuities were repealed and claimants could only look to Congress for legislation authorizing their payment it would be palpably unjust to apply any statute of limitation to them or to discriminate between claims equally meritorious. If after the long delay of Congress to act upon these claims, and after the Government has, by a course of conduct continued for over a quarter of a century, induced these claimants to believe their claims are just and that they would be paid by the Government, they are not to be paid some better excuse should be found than that they were not presented in time.

I have examined the debates in Congress upon the subject of the obligation of the Government to protect its citizens against depredations by the Indian tribes and to pay them for losses incurred by such depredations, and I am surprised to find that neither when the general laws under which the Government indemnified its citizens for such losses prior to the passage of the act of 1859, providing that depredation claims should not thereafter be paid out of the Treasury, nor when the act of 1871 providing that such claims should no longer be paid from annuities due the tribes committing the depredations without the consent of Congress, or when any of the private acts for the payment of such claims which have been passed were under consideration, was there any considerable discussion of the principles upon which such indemnity should be made or withheld. Congress appears to have assumed that such an obligation existed and to have acted upon it for over sixty years after the organization of the Government and to have suddenly, without much consideration or discussion, changed its policy and repudiated its obligations to its citizens in this regard if one exists.

I find myself, therefore, compelled, in support of the proposition that it is the duty of the Federal Government to afford protection to its citizens against Indian depredations and to make good their losses arising from inadequate protection, except in so far as the uniform course of the Government prior to 1859 tends to show the existence of such an obligation, to resort to first principles. I admit that the obligation, if it exists, must be traced to the duty of the Government to afford protection to each of its citizens in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, which lies at the foundation of the social compact. I need not stop to show that such a general obligation exists. Government is organized society. The word designates the aggregate powers, whatever the form, to which the exercise of sovereignity belongs in a State. It can exist no longer than it can compel the submission of all the citizens of the State to its authority expressed in accordance with the fundamental law which constitutes the social compact.

Submission to the Government is the primary obligation of the citizen, and protection of the citizen is the correlative obligation of the Government. Theoretically, it is the duty of the Government to afford protection to all its citizens in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, not only within its borders, but everywhere they may lawfully go. While its obligation to afford protection is sometimes by law devolved by the State upon municipal corporations intrusted with certain powers of Government, the duty is the duty of the State, the power so exercised being derived from the State. The Government of the United States forms no exception to this general rule. Within the powers conferred upon it by the Federal Constitution and for the purposes of its creation it demands the allegiance of the citizen, and to the extent of those powers it owes every citizen protection. As Congress has power "to declare war," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," and the States are prohibited from keeping ships or troops in time of peace, from entering into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power or to engage in war, it becomes the evident duty of the General Government to protect the citizens of the United States in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property against foreign powers and their citizens and subjects, and the obligation of the Government to do this has never been denied, and in the discharge of this obligation it has declared war, called into use the Army and Navy, taxed the people, and borrowed money upon the public credit.

The Senator from Georgia during the discussion of the educational bill cited an act of Congress approved by President Washington appropriating $4,539.06 to indemnify citizens of the United States for money paid by them as a ransom to the Government of Algiers (act approved May 30, 1796). This act was but a recognition of an obligation of the Government to its citizens, which, so far as I know, has never been repudiated in similar cases. The United States have never failed to demand of foreign nations satisfaction for injuries done by such foreign nations or their subjects to the persons or property of its citizens. The war with Algiers was waged for the purpose of punishing that state for depredations upon our commerce and the unlawful imprisonment of our citizens. The war of 1812 was caused by the interference of Great Britain with the rights of our merchant marine and of our sailors, and to-day, should the most powerful nation upon the earth, or the citizens of that nation upon the high seas or within the jurisdiction of such nation where our citizens under treaty stipulations have a lawful right to go for pleasure or profit, forcibly take or destroy the property of an American citizen and refuse to make restitution or submit the matter to arbitration, war would be declared against that nation, and the administration which should refuse to demand indemnity for such an outrage would be hurled from power by an indignant people.

The obligation of a government to protect its citizens in a foreign country is thus stated in Wheaton on International Law (Boyd's edition, page 207):

> The American citizen who goes into a foreign country is entitled to the protection of our Government, and if without the violation of any municipal law he should be unjustly oppressed, he would have a right to claim protection of his Government, and the interference of the American Government in his favor would be considered a justifiable interference.

This is from Halleck (page 276):

> If a state should neglect to enact the requisite laws to restrain its subjects and citizens from systematic and repeated aggressions upon the rights of others, and to enforce such laws when made, it not only exposes itself to the just hostility of the parties aggrieved, but virtually becomes an outlaw from the society of nations, and, by the well-established principles of international jurisprudence, is liable to be attacked and punished by all.

This is from another American authority, Woolsey (§ 62):

> Foreigners admitted into a country are subject to its laws. They are * * * entitled to protection, and failure to secure this or any act of oppression may be a ground of complaint, of retortion, or even of war, on the part of their native country.

Vattel states the principle thus:

> If a nation should refuse or fail to pass the laws necessary to restrain its citizens from aggression upon other states, or upon their citizens; or if, such laws being enacted, the officers of the state neglect to enforce them, and such aggressions by individuals result therefrom, the state is unquestionably responsible for the injury.

Hall, a recent writer in England, says:

> Prima facie a state is of course responsible for all acts or omissions taking place within its territory by which another state or the subjects of the latter are injuriously affected. * * * If the acts done are undisguisedly open or of common notoriety, the state is obviously responsible for not using proper means to repress them; as obviously it becomes responsible by way of complicity after the act if it does not inflict punishment to the extent of its legal powers.

Phillimore says (volume 2, chapter 2):

> The state to which the foreigner belongs may interfere for his protection when he has received positive maltreatment, or when he has been denied ordinary justice in the foreign country. The state of the foreigner may insist upon reparation immediately in the former case. In the latter the state must be satisfied that its citizen has exhausted the means of legal redress afforded by the tribunals of the country in which he has been injured. If those tribunals are unable or unwilling to entertain or adjudicate upon his grievance, the ground for interference is fairly laid. But it behooves the interfering state to take the utmost care, first, that the commission of the wrong be clearly established; secondly, that the denials of the local tribunals to decide the question at issue be no less clearly established. It is only after these propositions have been irrefragably proved that the state of the foreigner can demand reparation, and it is not until after the executive as well as the judicial authorities have refused redress that recourse can be had to reprisals, much less to war.

Our relations with the Indian tribes are as much under the exclusive power of the General Government as our relations with foreign nations. Congress has power under the Federal Constitution, and has always exercised it, to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. If the relations between the United States and the Indians are in any sense similar to those between the United States and foreign nations, then it is the duty of the General Government to afford its citizens protection against the Indian tribes; but I shall proceed to show that such is not the true relation, and that the obligation of the Government in this regard rests upon stronger grounds.

Predicated upon the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which provides:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature can not be convened), against domestic violence—

And upon the latter part of the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution, which is as follows:

> No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops, or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

The States and Territories have always preferred claims against the General Government for expenses incurred by them on account of volunteers and militia called out for their protection against hostile Indians, and where the emergency was such as to require action before the United States could or did take effective measures for their protection there is an unbroken line of precedents for the payment of such claims by the General Government.

For every wrong there should be a remedy. If one citizen of a State injures another in person or property the State ought to provide for the redress of that wrong by legal methods; and whenever the State, or municipal corporation within a State, fails to afford such reasonable protection as is within its powers to the citizen, the State or municipal corporation upon the plainest principles of justice should be required to indemnify the citizen for any loss sustained by reason of such failure.

The States are powerless under the Federal Constitution to protect their citizens from the Indian tribes. It is true that in case of actual Indian hostilities they may repel invasion and drive the murderous savages back to their cities of refuge—the reservations—but within them they are safe under the protecting ægis of the Federal authority. The States can not demand or enforce satisfaction from the Indians for the losses sustained by their citizens. The Federal Government interposes itself between the States and their citizens to shield the Indians from the ordinary and natural consequences of their acts. The citizen can not justly demand that recourse against the State which is allowed by the laws of many countries and many of the States for losses occasioned by lawlessness and violence, and can only look to the Federal Government for redress. Laws providing for making good at the public expense the losses of those who have been so unfortunate, as, without their own fault, to be injured and to suffer the loss of their property by acts of lawlessness and violence which it was the duty of the Government to prevent, have existed from an early period.

It was one of the institutions of Canute which was recognized by the Saxon laws that when any person was killed and the slayer had escaped, the ville should pay 40 marks for his death, and if it could not be raised in the ville then the hundred should pay for it.

In the statutes of Manchester (13 Edward I, chapter 1, page 1) provision is made touching the crimes of robbery, murder, and arson, that if the country, i. e., the jury, would not answer for the bodies of the offenders, the people dwelling in the county were to be amenable for the robberies and the damage sustained, so that the whole hundred where the robbery was committed, with the franchise thereof, should be amenable.

An act for consolidating and amending the laws of England relative to remedies against the hundred (7 and 8 George IV, chapter 31) repealed several prior acts providing remedies against the hundred for damage occasioned by persons violently and tumultously assembled, and provided a new method of procedure. As the hundreds were not corporations the action was to be brought against the constable, and the judgment being rendered the sheriff was to draw his warrant on the county treasurer for the amount of the recovery, and the money was to be collected by taxation from the hundred liable.

An act of the Legislative Assembly of the State of New York entitled "An act for compensating parties whose property may be destroyed in consequence of mobs or riots," passed April 13, 1855, provides for the bringing of an action to be prosecuted to judgment according to the usual modes of prosecuting suits against cities and counties by persons sustaining losses by destruction of property by mobs or riots, and under its provisions judgments were recovered against New York city by citizens whose property was destroyed by the draft riots of 1863.

The Legislative Assembly of Pennsylvania, by an act approved May 31, 1841, made the city of Philadelphia liable for property destroyed by a mob, and that act was by an act approved March 20, 1849, extended to Allegheny County, and under its provisions parties whose property was destroyed by mobs at Pittsburgh during the riots of July, 1877, recovered judgments against the county.

Similar statutes are in force in the following States: Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Wisconsin.

The laws of these States, as we have seen, are based upon a policy which is coeval with the laws of England.

The United States have assumed the control and management of the Indians, and in any possible view of the case should be held liable for their torts. If it be made to appear that any domestic animal is vicious and accustomed to do hurt, and that the owner has been notified of the fact, a duty is then imposed upon him to keep the animal secure, and he is responsible for the mischief done by the animal in consequence of a failure to observe the duty, and the duty to protect against vicious animals is imposed upon the keeper irrespective of ownership. The duty of one who should undertake to keep a dangerous wild animal would be even greater than that imposed upon the keeper of a vicious animal.

The practical relation of the General Government to the Indian tribes has been for years and is now that of guardian and ward. The Government has taken and exercised control of the persons and estates of the Indians. The general rule is that an infant is responsible for his torts as any other person would be, and certainly the Indian wards of the Government are entitled to no greater immunity than infants under guardianship. The Indians to-day, whether they are considered as owners of the soil of the reservations occupied by them or only as having the right of occupation, which must be extinguished by purchase before it is open to settlement under the land laws, are wealthy. Their average individual wealth is probably far above the average wealth of the citizens of the United States and of any other civilized country.

The total number of Indian reservations in 1880 was 147; total acreage 154,436,302; total number of Indians exclusive of the natives of Alaska was 253,934, which gives about 603.41 acres of land to each Indian. The Government is from year to year extinguishing the right of occupancy of its Indian wards to these lands and paying large sums to the Indians therefor; it also makes large appropriations from the Treasury for their support and education, and at the same time shields their property from the just demands of its citizens for losses on account of property stolen or destroyed.

The obligation of the General Government to support and educate the Indian, whatever may be its origin or extent, is a national obligation. There is no reason or justice in assuming that it must be discharged at the expense of individual citizens, and whenever the National Government refuses to pay the just demands of its citizens against the Indian tribes out of moneys due from the Government to such tribes, and which by treaty stipulations with them the Government has a right to retain and pay to its citizens in satisfaction of their claims, or which according to international law it would, in the exercise of its duty to protect the rights of its citizens, have the power to retain, and pays such moneys to the Indian tribes or expends it for their support and education, it discharges a national obligation at the expense of individual claims and upon the plainest principles of justice must be substituted for the Indian tribes and is in duty bound to make satisfaction to its citizens.

By the treaty between the United States and France, promulgated by the President December 21, 1801, the United States was relieved from certain embarrassing obligations to France arising under the treaty of alliance with that country of February 6, 1778, and the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, which obligations were no less than to guarantee the possessions of France in America, and of important privileges for the armed ships of France, and a promise of American convoy to French commerce, and in return set off and released the individual claims of her citizens against the French Government arising from the spoliation of our commerce by France. Eighty-four years afterward, at the last Congress, long after the original claimants and two succeeding generations had passed away, Congress provided for the payment of the private claims thus bartered away by the Government.

On January 17, 1870, Mr. Sumner made an exhaustive report upon these French spoliation claims, in which the grounds of the liability of the Government were clearly and forcibly stated, and from which I quote the following:

> Had the claims on each side been "national," no subsequent question could have occurred, for each would have extinguished the other in all respects forever. It was the peculiarity in this case that on one side the claims were "national," and on the other side "individual." But a set-off of "individual" claims against "national" claims must, of course, leave that government responsible which has appropriated the "individual" claims to this purpose. The set-off and mutual release is between nation and nation; but if the claims on one side are only "individual," and not "national," the nation which, by virtue of this consideration, is released from "national" obligations, must be substituted for the other nation as debtor, so that every "individual" whose claims are thus appropriated can confidently turn to it for satisfaction. On this point there can be no doubt, whether we regard it in the light of common sense, reason, duty, Constitution, or authority.
> (1) According to common sense, any "individual" interest appropriated to a "national" purpose must create a debt on the part of the nation, still further enhanced, if through this appropriation the nation is relieved from outstanding engagements already the occasion of infinite embarrassment, and hanging like a drawn sword over the future.
> (2) According to reason, any person intrusted with the guardianship of particular interests becomes personally responsible with regard to them, especially if he undertakes to barter them against other interests for which he is personally responsible. Thus, an attorney sacrificing the claims of his clients for the release of his own personal obligations becomes personally liable, and so also the trustee appropriating the trust fund for any personal interest becomes personally liable. All this is too plain for argument, but it is applicable to a nation as to an individual. In the case now before your committee, our Government was attorney to prosecute "individual" claims of citizens, and also trustee for their benefit, to watch and protect their interests, so that it was bound to all the responsibilities of attorney and trustee, absolutely incapaciated from any act of personal advantage, and compelled to regard all that it obtained whatever form of value it might assume, whether money or release, as a trust fund for the original claimants.
> (3) Duty, also, in harmony with reason, enjoins upon government the protection of citizens against foreign spoliations and the prosecution of their claims to judgment. Claimants are powerless as "individuals." Their claims are effective only when adopted by the nation. This duty, so obvious on general principles, was re-enforced in the present case by the special undertaking of Mr. Jefferson, already adduced, when he announced that he "had it in charge from the President to assure the merchants of the United States concerned in foreign commerce and navigation that due attention will be paid to any injuries they may suffer on the high seas or in foreign countries." Such a duty, thus founded and thus openly assumed, could not be abandoned, on any inducement proceeding from France, without a corresponding responsibility toward those citizens whose interests were allowed to suffer. A waiver of national duty, especially where made for the national benefit, must entail national obligation.
> (4) The Constitution also plainly requires what seems so obvious to common sense, reason, and duty, when it declares that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." Here, "private property," to a vast amount, was taken for "public use," involving the peace and welfare of the whole country; and down to this day the sufferers are petitioning Congress for that "just compensation" solemnly promised by the Constitution.
> (5) Public law is also in harmony with the Constitution in this requirement. According to Vattel, the sovereign may, in the exercise of his right of eminent domain, dispose of the property, and even the person, of a subject, by a treaty with a foreign power; "but," says this eminent authority, "as it is for the public advantage that he thus disposes of them, the state is bound to indemnify the citizens who are sufferers by the transaction." (Vattel, Law of Nations, book 4, chapter 2, § 12.) Words more applicable to the present case could not be employed.

This reasoning applies with equal force to the case under consideration, in which the United States, guardian of the Indian wards and of the interests of its own citizens, to save expenditures from its Treasury on account of such wards, interposes its authority to prevent the appropriation of the property of its wards to compensate its own citizens for losses arising from the torts of such wards. The analogy is complete.

In the discharge of its obligation to protect its citizens from losses from Indian depredations the Government has in many instances in treaties with the Indian tribes stipulated for the payment, out of annuities coming to such tribes, of claims against them for depredations committed on the property of white men. In other treaties the Indians have been required to agree to use their best efforts to return stolen property and to punish offenders. In others the United States has stipulated that the Indians should be paid by the Government for depredations committed upon their property by white men. I will submit at the close of my remarks lists of these treaties.

Numerous special acts for the payment of the losses of citizens on account of Indian depredations have been passed by Congress, extending from 1819 up to last session, so that precedents are not wanting for such payment, even since the provisions for the payment of such claims out of the Treasury and out of annuities without special appropriations were repealed.

I have prepared a list of such special acts (but which I am not certain contains them all) showing in each case whether payment was made out of the Treasury or from Indian annuities. The total amount of the appropriations from the Treasury is $1,604,028.25. The total appropriations from Indian annuities is $197,716.37. These totals do not include the sum paid under the general laws heretofore referred to.

The Senate amendment striking out of the Indian appropriation bill of last session the provisions for the payment of sundry depredation claims was adopted upon the ground that it was general legislation upon an appropriation bill. But with strange inconsistency the Senate Committee on Appropriations reported the sundry civil appropriation bill with a clause appropriating $46,770.21 to pay H. C. Oburn, out of annuities, for depredations committed by the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians, and the bill passed with the provision.

Able reports have been made upon some of the private bills which have been passed by Congress for payment of such claims in which the grounds of the liability of the Government are stated with much force. From report No. 780, made by Mr. Comingo at the first session of the Forty-third Congress upon the bill (H. R. 3315) for the relief of John Fletcher, I quote the following:

Such being the facts in the case, is the Government liable to indemnify claimant for his said loss? That we may be able to arrive at a satisfactory and just conclusion in the premises, it may be well to consider the relations the Indians bear to the Government, and the legislation that affects that relation. Between them and the citizens of the United States legislation has interposed a "high wall and a deep ditch," and has thereby left the latter without remedy, if the Government is not liable for the depredations of those around whom it has thrown its protecting arms, and between whom and its citizens it has interposed insuperable barriers.

The Indians have long been regarded and treated as the wards of the Government. This relation was recognized and acted upon almost three-quarters of a century ago, and at no time since has it been disclaimed. As far back as 1802 our ancestors saw the propriety and necessity of protecting the citizens of the then feeble Republic from the rapacity and violence of that race, and provided means of indemnity for spoliations committed by such of them as were in "amity with the United States." (2 Statutes at Large, page 143.)

This liability and promise to indemnify continued as a part of the written law of the land from that time until 1859, when, as we shall presently see, the promise, but not the liability, was revoked by act of Congress. The liability, in the opinion of your committee, did not depend upon, nor was it created by, the promise. It existed independent of the latter—the latter being a simple recognition of the former; and, in the opinion of your committee, the liability has not yet been ignored, but to the contrary has been recognized in all subsequent legislation on the subject, although the express promise of indemnity has been recalled.

The trade-and-intercourse act of 1834 expressly repeals that of 1802 (4 Statutes at Large, page 734); but by the seventeenth section of said act (4 Statutes at Large, page 731) provisions are made for full indemnity, and the same is guaranteed by the Government. This statute remained in force from the 30th of June, 1834, to the 28th of February, 1859, at which time it was repealed. The repealing clause is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and to preserve peace on the frontiers,' approved June 30, 1834, as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases by Indians trespassing on white men, as described in said act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair or destroy the obligation of the Indians to make indemnification out of the annuities as prescribed in said act." (11 Statutes at Large, page 401, section 8.)

Let it be remembered that this leaves in force all of said act except the clause that guarantees indemnity out of the Treasury. The seventeenth section of the act of June 30, 1834, contains the following among other provisions:

"Provided, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent shall in any way violate any of the provisions of this act, by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, he shall forfeit all claims on the United States for such indemnification."

Thus, we find, the citizens of the United States are wholly without remedy for wrongs and injuries perpetrated by the Indians unless by reason of the peculiar relationship they sustain to the Government, and the exclusive guardianship over them, assumed by the latter, it is responsible for their willful and unprovoked trespasses.

The act of July 15, 1870 (16 Statutes at Large, section 4, page 360), forbids the use of any part of the annuities then due, or thereafter to become due, the Indians designated in the act in payment of claims growing out of their depredations. It should be observed that it does not ignore the liability of the Government in such cases, but rather recognizes it by providing that claims of that character shall not be paid out of annuities, and that they may be paid by a special appropriation made for that purpose by an act of Congress.

The section last referred to reads as follows:

"That no part of the moneys hereby appropriated by this act, or which may hereafter be appropriated in any general act or deficiency bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, to pay annuities due to or to be used and expended for the care and benefit of any tribe or tribes of Indians named herein, shall be applied to the payment of any claim for depredations that may have been or that may be committed by said tribe or tribes, or any member or members thereof; and no claims for Indian depredations shall hereafter be paid, until Congress shall make special appropriations therefor; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

By the 7th section of an act approved May 29, 1872 (17 Statutes at Large, page 190), the last clause of the foregoing section is re-enacted, and it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to prepare and publish such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary, prescribing the manner of presenting claims for compensation for depredations committed by Indians, and the degree and character of the evidence necessary to support the same, and to report to Congress, at each session thereof, the nature and character, &c., of such claims, whether allowed by him or not, and the evidence on which the action was based.

Provisions are thus made for ascertaining the extent of injuries that may be inflicted on citizens of the United States; the result of these injuries we call claims, and we provide that they may be paid out of our general treasury, and that they shall not be paid out of the annuities due or to become due the Indians. If we do not thereby recognize a right on the part of those who suffer from the depredations of these people to recover the actual damages they may sustain, what is the meaning and effect of all this legislation? Why do we forbid the injured to redress their own grievances? and why lock up the annuities of those who despoil our citizens, and hold out a pretended promise of payment?

Congress may make appropriations to pay these losses. This is plain. But it is insisted by some that there is no legal liability to pay them. If this be true, when did the liability cease? Why have we continued to pay some of these claims, and why make provisions for prosecuting them in the manner in which we have done? and why do we provide for paying them out of the Treasury? If they are not valid claims, by what authority can we appropriate money out of the Treasury to pay them? The right of recovery depends, in each case, on the particular facts that bear upon it. In this respect it does not differ from the right of recovery in any civil action, such as assumpsit, covenant, or tresspass.

And from Report No. 253, made by Mr. Mason in the House of Representatives at the Forty-seventh Congress upon the bill (H. R. 2824) for the relief of William Franklin Grounds, I quote the following:

Your committee are satisfied that the claim of Mr. Grounds is a just one, and that the Government is under obligations to compensate him for these losses. In arriving at these conclusions, your committee are guided by numerous legislative precedents in cases similar to this, and by the principles declared by eminent publicists. They believe that it would be in violation of the spirit of our institutions to impose on one citizen the burdens which should be borne by all, and that the citizen who pays taxes, bears arms, serves on juries, and bears his just proportion of the burdens of Government, and complies with all its exactions, is entitled to security in person and property, and to the prompt fulfillment by the Government of all the obligations it is under to him as a citizen.

The Committee on Indian Affairs of the United States Senate, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, to whom was referred a bill authorizing the payment of certain claims for Indian depredations, and in which the equities were not as clear and strong as those which exist in this case, say:

"The spoliations for which redress is now sought were caused by predatory expeditions, undertaken without lawful authority and without cause, as likewise without the usual formalities, and solely with the view to plunder, and is therefore excepted by Vattel and all the approved publicists from the principle under which redress is here sought to be derived, and brings it within the principle under which, by the practice of all civilized nations, the citizen or subject has been held entitled to indemnity, and under which this Government has uniformly extended redress." (Senate Report No. 244, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, volume 2.)

These great principles of government have been recognized and passed into a compact between this Government and the citizen in the several "trade and intercourse laws" enacted by Congress in 1802, 1834, and 1859. Since then it has repeatedly, in the hundreds of private acts for relief, recognized its obligations to pay the citizen out of the Treasury of the United States for losses sustained by Indian depredations. It has gone even further, and paid friendly Indians for losses sustained at the hands of hostiles of the same tribe when they (the hostiles) failed to make restitution of the property stolen, as stipulated in the articles of capitulation.

The law of 1859 repealing the provisions of the act of 1834, by which the United States guaranteed eventual indemnity for losses on account of Indian depredations, and which provided for the payment of such claims out of the Treasury, was an amendment to the Indian appropropriation bill, and passed without much consideration and without debate. But the act of 1870 provoked more discussion. In the Senate, during the debate upon the bill, Mr. Thayer, of Nebraska, said:

Mr. THAYER. The honorable Senator from Iowa and the honorable Senator from Oregon say that in some cases the annuities of Indian tribes have been absorbed in meeting these claims. I tell those two Senators that the property, the all of settlers on the frontier has been destroyed by Indians; and I say to them also that the way to produce an effect upon the Indians is by letting them know that if they commit these depredations their annuities shall be taken to pay for them. That is the only way in which you will reach them. That is the only way in which you will have an effect on the Indians and compel them to cease their depredations on the settlers. The last remedy for a man whose property, whose crops, whose horses, and whose cattle have been taken from him by Indians is to tell him to come to Congress and wait until the day of doom before he can get satisfaction or compensation. I trust that this whole section will be stricken out.

Mr. Tipton said:

Every Senator here who knows anything about the new States knows that when a band of savages pass through our borders, or when the Indians who are on the reservations pass through our States, there is nothing that protects the property of the settler so well as a consciousness on the part of the chiefs and the headmen of the the Indians that if the stock of the settler is killed, if his crops are destroyed, their annuities may be reached and they will feel it in their pockets. Nothing so completely gives protection to the settler as that. Then, when their young men spread upon the prairies and roam about at will, when they come upon the cabin of a settler and his property is entirely in their power, they will have been warned by those in authority over them not to touch it or the value of the property will be taken out of their annuities. I tell you that gives us more protection when they pass through our inhabited counties and portions of our States than anything else that you can devise. But let it be understood that if they commit depredations, those who complain of them, if they can make a case, may come to Congress and get their pay out of the Treasury of the United States, and who cares what depredations are then committed? I say that unless this section be stricken out, or so amended that the redress shall be direct upon the tribe or upon the annuities of the tribe, we shall have very little protection.

Mr. Williams said:

It is a mistaken policy, in my judgment, that undertakes to throw around these Indian tribes the protection of law in robbery, a thing which they will understand just as well as white men. It will not be long before the Indians will know that they can with impunity make inroads upon the white settlers and steal their horses and cattle, and carry them away and make use of them, and that there is no remedy for the white persons so injured.

In the House of Representatives Mr. Degener said:

I am not a lawyer, but common sense teaches me that if any person chooses to keep a dangerous animal on his premises, say a rattlesnake in his room; if he chooses to feed it, chooses to provide a warm blanket for that rattlesnake, so that it may not suffer from cold, and if he does not choose to extract the poisonous fangs of that animal then he becomes responsible should that rattlesnake escape from his room and go upon the premises of his neighbor and there bite his neighbor, or his neighbor's wife, or children, or his cattle. I believe common sense teaches us that that is the correct principle.

Mr. Wilkinson said:

The principle is essentially just, and there is no reason for changing the existing law except the clamor which has risen on account of the reputation that the Indian Department has had before the country. If the Indian Department stood as well before the country as the Treasury Department there is not a man in this House who would think of making the change proposed by this amendment.

Mr. Paine said:

On the other hand, it is desirable, if possible, to so regulate the payment of our annuities to the Indians that we may avoid the difficulties, the animosities, and the troubles that will be sure to grow out of the collection of false and fictitious and sham claims against the Indians. If there were an absolute certainty that only just claims would be presented against these Indians, if we were sure that only the claims of honest frontiersmen whose property had actually been destroyed or stolen would be presented and paid out of the moneys which would otherwise be devoted to the payment of these annuities, then I would have no hesitation in allowing the law to stand as it now is. But there is the danger that, by permitting the law to stand as it now is, we shall give encouragement to the prosecution of unjust claims. I believe everybody understands that it has been true that large numbers of outrageous claims have been presented against the Indians; demands made by men who set themselves deliberately to work to trump up claims upon no substantial foundation, for the purpose of robbing these Indians. On the whole, for the purpose of avoiding that difficulty, I am willing to encounter another.

And during the debate upon the act of May 16, 1872, Mr. Harlan, of Iowa, said:

Under the amendment the Senate has agreed to, the last amendment preceding this offered by the honorable Senator from Nebraska, it will be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to examine these claims and report them to Congress. Then Congress can make an appropriation to pay each claim that is specifically reported by the Department. It seems to me that would be much safer than to order their payment out of the appropriations made to feed and clothe these Indians that are now being supported by the Government and have no other resource whatever, except preying on the frontier settlements.

From these debates it is apparent that it was not the intention of Congress by the acts of 1859, 1870, and 1872 to repudiate its obligations to its citizens on account of these claims, but only to require that the same should not be paid without special appropriation by Congress for that purpose. The statement of Senator Thayer that "the last remedy for a man whose property, whose crops, whose horses, and whose cattle have been taken from him by the Indians is to tell him to come to Congress and wait until the day of doom before he can get satisfaction or compensation" was prophetic.

The discussion in the Senate of the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out the provisions in the Indian appropriation bill of last session as it came from the House, for the payment of certain depredation claims which had been presented to the Department of the Interior, audited, and reported to Congress, was, I think, the most extended discussion which ever took place in Congress upon the subject of the payment of such claims, and no Senator during that discussion ventured to question or deny the obligation of the Government to pay such claims, but all the Senators who took any considerable part in the debate expressed the opinion that such an obligation exists.

Mr. PLUMB said:

* * * * * * *

While I say that, I am as earnest as any one can be in favor of the Government adopting a rule which shall result in the payment of what I regard as justly an obligation against the Government as any other one which it is called upon to respond to. There are millions of dollars, I believe, certainly many hundreds of thousands of dollars, which the Government of the United States owes to claimants all over the country. I have no doubt the case of which the Senator from California speaks is one, to a certain extent at all events; possibly there may be some doubt about the amount; but in all these cases there ought to be a tribunal provided for the ascertainment of the amount due. I introduced a bill years ago, and have reintroduced it, to have an auditing of these claims in order that they might come before Congress not as objects of suspicion, but upon their true footing as genuine existing liabilities against the Government, and having had all the scrutiny that they ought to have preceding their allowance. The Committee on Appropriations, for the purpose of bringing about this result, seized upon an amendment offered to the bill in the House and so reframed it as they believe will result in establishing the validity or invalidity of these claims in such a way that they will not be subject to objection any longer.

Mr. DAWES said:

* * * * * * *

Instead of committing the United States to the payment of particular claims by paying 15 per cent. upon them and letting all this vast amount remain back waiting for that provision to go through, the Committee on Appropriations have proposed, on page 47 of the bill, this amendment, which I beg leave to read:

"For the investigation of certain Indian depredations claims, $10,000; and in expending said sum the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a complete list of all claims heretofore filed in the Interior Department and which have been approved in whole or in part and now remain unpaid, and also all such claims as are pending but not yet examined, on behalf of citizens of the United States on account of depredations committed, chargeable against any tribe of Indians by reason of any treaty between such tribe and the United States, including the name and address of the claimants, the date of the alleged depredations, by what tribe committed, the date of examination and approval, with a reference to the date and clause of the treaty creating the obligation for payment, to be made and presented to Congress at its next regular session; and the Secretary is authorized and empowered, before making such report, to cause such additional investigation to be made and such further testimony to be taken as he may deem necessary to enable him to determine the kind and value of all property damaged or destroyed by reason of the depredations aforesaid, and by what tribes such depredations were committed; and his report shall include his determination upon each claim, together with the names and residences of witnesses and the testimony of each, and also what funds are now existing or to be derived by reason of treaty or other obligation out of which the same should be paid."

The Secretary of the Interior is required to pass upon these claims. He has passed upon them in the past in the manner which I have suggested. He has not had the money to send anybody into the Territories where it has been alleged that these depredations have been made. He has the power under the statute, but he has not had the money; he has had no men that he could pay for that purpose. Therefore, whenever a man sent his claim up here or referred it to the agent of the tribe, when the agent of the tribe got the affidavits furnished by the claimant and sent them up here, without any hearing or cross-examination whatever, the Secretary of the Interior has written "approved;" and the claims come to Congress, thirty-one hundred of them in a single letter, amounting to more than a million and a half dollars, and a dozen of them were put upon a single page in this bill by the other branch with a stipulation that only 15 per cent. should be paid. Fifteen per cent. of them would take twice as much as the very Indians upon whom they are charged have got in the Treasury; and we are called upon in this bill, independent of that, to appropriate some $25,000 to support and feed these very Indians.

I submit that the safest way is the one proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, and that any other way is unsafe, unfair to other claimants, invidious, unjust, and groundless discrimination in favor of these claims.

Mr. COKE said:

I think, Mr. President, that a proper measure of justice to the claimants who have suffered from Indian depredations would suggest to the committee and to the Senate that the claims which have been investigated under acts of Congress prescribing the mode and manner of their investigation, which are on file in the Interior Department, and have been reported to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, approved by him as just and honest claims, should be embraced in this bill, and appropriations made to pay them. The committee propose by their amendment that they shall be reinvestigated. Why reinvestigate claims which have already been fully investigated? We must presume that they have been fully investigated, because the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the agents and superintendents over the Indians, all had authority to make the investigations, to summon witnesses and take depositions, and upon their investigation, presumably correctly made, the Secretary of the Interior has reported a large number of these claims, belonging chiefly in Kansas, Colorado, and Texas, as just and approved by him.

The committee now propose to reinvestigate those claims after a lapse of from fifteen to twenty years, when all the testimony has gone, possibly when the facts upon which the claims are founded are necessarily obscured from loss of testimony and death of witnesses. There is no justice in such a course.

The people of the frontier States knew that they had no recourse against the Indians, except what Congress gave them, and Congress in the acts to which I have referred prescribed certain methods which they have pursued. They submitted themselves fully to the jurisdiction prescribed; and now, after their claims have been approved by the tribunal appointed by Congress, their witnesses dead or scattered, they are to be called upon to again come forward and resubstantiate the same claims already adjudicated and on file in the Department and reported approved to Congress.

* * * * * * *

I know something about these claims for Indian depredations. I know that the frontier of Texas was at one time driven back 75 miles by hostile Indians from the Fort Sill reservation, where they were under the care and control and management and protection of the Government of the United States. The people of Texas dared not go upon that reservation to retaliate. They could have gone there and wiped out the Indians, but the United States Government protected them. Whenever a full moon shone at night they came down upon Texas, drove off cattle and horses, burned houses and killed and scalped men, and carried women and children into captivity.

* * * * * * *

I have no doubt that the same experience was realized by all the other frontier States. I have personal knowledge of the fact that until the State of Texas organized a battalion of State troops and sent them to the frontier and protected the settlers against the Indians, the frontier was almost abandoned. I know hundreds and hundreds of men in Texas who had thousands of head of cattle and hundreds of head of horses, who lost every dollar's worth of property they had by the depredations of those Indians. Yet the Senator from Massachusetts would cast an imputation upon the justice of these claims, examined and approved as they have been.

* * * * * * *

As the Senate Committee on Appropriations determined that they would not appropriate the money now to pay these claims, that they would not put these claims thus approved and reported upon this bill, then I believe the next best thing for them to do was, as the committee has done, require a full report of all these claims to be made to Congress at the next session, and when this report comes in and we see what they all amount to I shall favor, and I believe that the honor of the Government will require, that Congress shall take steps to liquidate them at once. I do not see why those who have honest claims for Indian depredations should be sneered at. They are the pioneers of the country. They have gone westward until we have no frontier left, blazing the way for settlement and civilization.

Mr. MANDERSON said:

Mr. President, I certainly quite agree with the suggestions made by the Senator from Texas in regard to the duty of the Government to pay those who have suffered loss on the frontier of the country by reason of Indian depredations, and I wish to supplement his suggestion as to the claims mentioned in this bill, in that part of the bill which has already been stricken out by the action of the committee, by reading from a report of the Committee on Claims. It was stated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] that the claims presented in this bill had been reported adversely by the committee. That statement is truthful; but it does not tell all the truth. The inference might follow that these claims were rejected because of lack of merit, for fraud, or because the parties had not suffered the losses they pretended to have suffered; but that is not the finding of the committee. The Committee on Claims, following the action of the Interior Department, reports as to these claims, and I read from the report:

"The claimants are all citizens of Texas, generally engaged in agriculture or stock-raising, quietly and peaceably pursuing their avocations, having nothing to do with trade or traffic with the Indians, and in no way connected with any disturbance between whites and Indians there or elsewhere. They were all citizens of the State of Texas, and while engaged in peaceful pursuits were set upon by bands of Indians (who were supposed to be under the restraint and control of the Government on their reservations), their stock stampeded and driven off, and other property destroyed or carried away, and in many cases their herders killed or wounded. They have, as the evidence shows, at all times refrained from any violation of law by taking the remedy into their own hands and giving blow for blow, but have, in compliance with the laws which Congress has from time to time passed for their protection and indemnity, made out their claims, supported them by ample proof, both as to quantity and value, and have presented them to the officers designated by the Government to examine into their justness and the truthfulness of their statements; and those officers, after having sent the claims to the agents of the different tribes to be presented to the Indians for their statements in regard to them, and after hearing the reports of those agents and making a careful examination of the proofs offered by the claimants, have allowed them the various sums for payment of which the claimants now ask an appropriation by Congress."

So that these claims have not been allowed by the Department of the Interior upon mere ex parte affidavits, but upon full investigation and with a chance to the Indians themselves, through their agents, to be heard.

They are taken up in this report, and although the committee recognizes their merit and the obligation upon the Government to pay this class of claims, it does report adversely to them, as suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, in this language:

"As stated in your committee's report upon the claim of Overton and Love, there are a large number of these claims, equally meritorious, on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. No good reason can be given for paying the claims under consideration without paying them all. This committee can not recommend the passage of such claims until Congress adopts some general policy of dealing with all these claims."

I admit that the suggestion of the committee is a wise one. All of these claims should be dealt with, but year after year rolls by and they are not paid. In my own State I know of existing claims, as valid and as meritorious as those that are stated in the report, that are nearly a quarter of a century old, for depredations committed by Indians upon frontiersmen who were invited by the Government to go upon Government land, and these men driven from their lands, their homes destroyed, and in frequent instances members of their families killed or treated worse by Indian depredators, remain with their serious losses yet unpaid.

I submit, Mr. President, that it is a crying shame that these claims have not been paid.

Mr. MAXEY said:

Mr. President, the general plan for efficient and prompt settlement of outstanding claims proposed by the Committee on Appropriations I think is wise; but I submit to that committee and to the Senate whether there is any reason why, because they propose to adopt that plan, the claims which have been allowed by the House and which come to us as approved claims shall be stricken out of the bill. In other words, the law has always favored the vigilant. If gentlemen who have claims have gone to the labor and the expense of gathering up their testimony, of laying it before the Secretary of the Interior, of having their claims examined and approved and recommended to Congress and Congress in its wisdom allows those claims and the bill comes to us with those claims thus allowed, I ask if there is any reason or propriety in striking out all the claims allowed, as found on pages 8, 9, 10, &c., of the bill which comes to us from the House, simply because a provision is made by the Appropriations Committee for a general settlement of all such claims? If the claims which are allowed are just in themselves, and the Senator in charge of this bill does not gainsay that proposition; if they are right why should they be struck out in order to take their place under the general plan of settlement when they have already been examined and approved and allowed by the proper committee of the House as just and proper claims? I can, therefore, see no reason why these claims shall be stricken out, nor do I see any conflict between the claims which are allowed by the House standing as a part of this bill and the proviso which is put in by the Appropriations Committee of the Senate in respect to those claims which are not as yet allowed or have not been sent up by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, it is to the interest of the Republic that there be an end of litigation, and if these men have had claims litigated and passed upon and they have been allowed by the House, why should they be stricken out of the bill by the Senate? It is not pretended that they are not just claims. If there was a shadow of suspicion cast on the claims there would be some reason in that, but there is none. They are admitted to be just, they are admitted to be right, but they are simply stricken out because they may conflict with the plan proposed for future settlements. These claims having been already settled, why should they be relegated to the future to be settled then? I can not see any reason for that. It does not seem to me to be a fair proposition.

Mr. MILLER, of California, said:

What I object to is this practice of the Government of the United States, which is unbecoming a great government, interposing technical objections to shillyshally around and put off payment in the manner of a bankrupt debtor or a man who is not disposed to pay his debts. That is the position in which the Committee on Appropriations to-day are putting the Government of the United States in relation to the citizens who hold these claims. That there is an obligation to pay these claims out of the funds held in trust by the Government belonging to the Indians, there can be no doubt; but the Committee on Appropriations or the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs who has charge of this bill seems to desire to put off the payment continually. It is so year after year. This process has been going on for a great many years, and when we are confronted by the condition of things, then we invent some new scheme, some new plan by which these claims shall be put off; we have not got the report we want, or there is something lacking, and a man who has vigilantly prosecuted his claim and has had it adjudicated, and the amount found due shall not be paid because somebody who has not used the time diligently and whose claim has not been adjudicated is not paid, and that furnishes a reason why the man who has a just claim which has been adjudicated shall not be paid. That seems to me a strange position to take. I can not see why when a claim is adjudicated and found to be due this great Government should desire to put off the day of payment, and to bring up technical and other objections to avoid the payment.

* * * We have said that these Indian disturbances were not wars, that Indians were not to be regarded as belligerents. They are wards of the nation. The Government of the United States has assumed to take care of them and to protect the frontier against them by placing them on reservations and under the control of the military; and they have thus invited people to go on the frontier, risk their lives, and risk their property.

The Government has invited them to do that and has placed agents over the Indians; but for all that they break out and they carry with them the torch; they burn, pillage, rob, destroy, murder, and carry into captivity; and when these unfortunate people come to Congress and ask for relief, because every man has not been prepared to bring forward his claim in the mode and manner which is required all others who have done so are to be relegated to some commission hereafter to be appointed to regulate these things. Sir, that is not just. Let "every tub stand upon its own bottom." If a man has an honest claim let it be brought forward, and if the claims amount to $8,000,000, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, if they are just claims for depredations committed by these wards of the nation upon the defenseless frontier people in the destruction and robbery of their property, this Government, as an upright and honorable and honest gentleman would do, ought to pay the last dollar of it if the Indians have not enough money of their own to pay that debt. I assume in the broadest form the position that it would be just and right and fair to do it.

Mr. COCKRELL said:

It is a matter of absolute necessity that we shall sift these claims, that we shall ascertain those that are properly chargeable against the nations and tribes that have annuities and with whom we have treaty stipulations and whose money we have, so that we can pay the claims. Now, I am for making these Indians pay every solitary dollar due for the actual depredations committed by them, whenever they have any money or whenever they have any lands out of which they can be paid. I want to hold them responsible to the fullest extent of the law; but I only want to pay what is actually due, the real value of the property destroyed or the real injury done to it, and not mere imaginative damages that may have resulted, and which should never be allowed in any court of justice. Therefore we put in the amendment, under the head of "Indian depredation claims," at page 47, requiring a thorough investigation of this whole matter. We appropriate $10,000 for it. The Secretary can take this money and he can have a thorough investigation made; he can report to us all the facts; he can show us the evidence upon which these claims are allowed, and the treaties and the funds. Then we can go to work and settle the cases intelligently and honestly and fairly; but we can not do it until we have that information, and it is idle to undertake to do it. We are simply making fish of one and flesh of another. We are making a favorite of one, and we are doing great injustice and wrong to hundreds of others.

If it was not the intention of Congress that payment of these claims should be ultimately made by the United States the appropriation of $10,000 at the last session of Congress for the purpose of having such claims investigated and reported upon by the Secretary of the Interior, was a waste of money and useless legislation. I have a right, therefore, to assume that the provision of the act in question for the examination of such claims and requiring a report of those approved by the Secretary of the Interior to be transmitted to Congress, was for the purpose of providing a basis for an appropriation by Congress at a subsequent session for payment thereof. Congress should treat the report of the Secretary of the Interior as conclusive so far as the claims that are approved are concerned, and appropriate money for their payment. The bill presented by me to authorize suit in the Court of Claims would then be applicable to claims which have been heretofore disallowed by the Department, to claims which have been heretofore filed but have not been examined and reported, and to those which may hereafter be filed.

I think the Government is morally bound to pay the claims which have been proven under the laws and the rules and regulations prescribed by the Interior Department, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and reported to Congress. I do not care, however, so much for the manner in which the object I have in view, which is, the payment of these claims, is accomplished as I do that some action shall be taken by Congress now, without further delay, which will accomplish it. The inaction and indifference of Congress in this matter is a disgrace to the Government and an injustice to its citizens which should be no longer permitted.

It is because I suppose the bill offered by me to refer claims of this character hereafter to the Court of Claims will not be subject to some of the objections which have been heretofore urged against the payment of these claims, and may therefore find favor with the majority of both Houses of Congress, that I have offered it.

By reference to the first section of the bill it will be seen that it does not create a new class of claims against the United States. It provides a more satisfactory method for the examination and determination of a class of claims already recognized. As I have shown, claims for Indian depredations are now considered in the Interior Department upon ex parte affidavits, filed by the claimants, and upon such further information as the agents of the Department are able to gather. When examined in the Department they are reported to Congress, which, instead of treating the approval of the claims by the Secretary of the Interior as conclusive, and making an appropriation to pay them, either takes no action or delays final action, and postpones the day of settlement and payment by expedients like that adopted at the last session, when provision for the payment of certain claims was stricken out of the Indian appropriation bill by the Senate, and an appropriation of $10,000 made for examination and report upon such claims by the Secretary of the Interior. The truth is that neither the Department of the Interior nor Congress is so situated as properly to examine claims of this character.

No greater objection has ever been urged to these claims than that the ex parte examination which they have hitherto undergone necessarily fails to separate the good from the bad, and indeed invites fraud. The provisions of the present bill answer any such objection.

In the Court of Claims the Government is represented by the Attorney-General through his assistants. All the machinery of the Department of Justice is at the disposal of the Government in securing evidence. No testimony can be taken ex parte, but under the rules governing the court the Government is present by its counsel at the examination of all witnesses and can call witnesses in defense. The methods of procedure in that court are simple, and there is no better way of securing an impartial and thorough examination and just decision of the claims for Indian depredations than by submitting them to it. The court is able, as I will presently show, to dispose of a much larger amount of business than is now before it. Probably the passage of this bill would necessitate the appointment of additional counsel to represent the Government in cases brought under it, as the force of attorneys for the Government has not heretofore been large enough. With a slight addition in this respect, cases arising under this bill could be promptly considered and decided.

Propositions to refer claims of this class to commissioners are open to objections. It would be difficult to obtain commissioners of sufficient learning and experience who would accept temporary official positions and who would dispose of interests so important in a manner acceptable to the claimants and the Government. Commissioners would be obliged also to act as counsel for the United States as well as judges. It need not be said that these two positions are incompatible and that a judge so situated is hardly able to render an impartial decision. If this work were done by commissioners Congress would be overwhelmed by petitions of unsuccessful claimants for relief. This has been the past experience with commissioners and special tribunals. Suitors against the Government should have the same right to trial in a judicial tribunal as other suitors.

The sixth and seventh sections of the bill are in harmony with the policy of the Government as expressed by the act of 1834. It is provided that judgments shall be paid out of Indian annuities, if any exist. An examination of the Indian treaties shows that a large proportion of all the treaties ever made with the Indian tribes contain provisions that claims for depredations shall be paid out of the annuities due such tribes. The course of legislation shows that where annuities have existed this has been the uniform rule from 1796 to the present time. In the absence of treaties especially designating this course the obligation of the Indian tribe is equally strong. A tribe committing depredations can not expect to receive trust funds from the Government while claims of its citizens arising out of their own misconduct are unpaid. The rights of the Indians are sacred, but no more sacred than the rights of innocent white citizens. The line must be drawn between justice and sentiment. The white man must be given justice as well as the Indian.

These principles are carried to their logical and proper extent by this bill by providing that, if there are no annuities and funds become due to the Indians from the sale of their lands, then they must pay out of such funds for their depredations, or out of any appropriations made for their benefit other than for their subsistence, support, and education. Should there be no funds in the hands of the Government due the Indians it is provided by the bill that the judgment of the court shall be paid out of the Treasury. This adopts the provisions upon this subject of the act of 1834, which was only a re-enactment of the provisions of the acts of 1796, 1799, and 1802. The provision is only a discharge by the Government of its just obligations arising out of peculiar relations of the Government, the citizen, and the Indians.

When the act of 1870 was passed directing that no claim should be paid out of annuities without the special authority of Congress, there were many annuities due to Indian tribes which have since been fully paid.

A reference to House Executive Document 5, Forty-first Congress, second session, page 182, shows that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $4,167,486.36 was appropriated for fulfilling treaties with various Indian tribes. All this sum was, under the laws and treaties, subject to the payment of claims for depredations committed by the Indians to whom annuities were due. The act of 1834 pledged the Government to such payments. But since then very few claims have been paid, while the annuities have been gradually exhausted with the lapse of years, until the Secretary of the Treasuary reports in 1884 that the sum of $1,420,150 only is necessary to carry out treaty stipulations for the year ending June 30, 1886.

The guarantor trustee has paid out the funds without regard to its own obligations as guarantor and must answer from its own estate.

Congress has at almost every session passed some bill for the payment of Indian depredation claims, and at every session claims as meritorious as those passed are presented and ignored. The passage of this bill would at once relieve Congress from further consideration of this class of claims. It would remove the objection made to their payment that they are exaggerated and have not been established with sufficient certainty to justify appropriations, and provide the most satisfactory way of ascertaining the amount of loss sustained by each claimant. While it would entail some expense upon the claimants, they would, I believe, gladly accept its provisions and be satisfied with the final adjustment of their claims under it.

The present system of auditing claims of the character under consideration is a delusion; it has outlived the purpose for which it was instituted; appropriations no longer follow as a matter of course, either for the payment of these claims, as audited, out of the Treasury, or from annuities due the Indians chargeable with the depredations.

I have considered the question of the ability of the Court of Claims to dispose of the additional business which would be imposed upon it by this bill should it become a law, and find that it will be able without any additional clerical or other force to dispose of such business. The expense of examining these claims under this bill would be no greater than the expense now caused by the examination of them by the Interior Department. In answer to a letter addressed by me to Hon. William A. Richardson, chief-justice of the Court of Claims, I received the following:

COURT OF CLAIMS CHAMBERS, Washington, February 23, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, with a copy of Senate bill No. 1407, "in relation to Indian depredations."

You say that you "have been informed that the impression is prevalent, to some extent, that the Court of Claims would be unable to dispose of any considerable addition to the business now before it," and you ask me to inform you whether it would be possible for the court to dispose promptly of cases which might arise under this bill should it become a law, and whether any changes in existing law would be necessary to enable the court to determine the causes which might go before it, should the bill be passed by Congress.

The impression to which you refer is an erroneous one. Although the business of the court has been largely increased of late, no difficulty has been or is likely to be found in disposing of it as fast as the parties are ready for trial.

Of course the judges are required to work somewhat harder, but of that they do not complain. They always hold themselves in readiness cheerfully and promptly to do whatever business Congress sees fit to put upon them.

When the Bowman bill, which became the "act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government" (22 Statutes at Large, 485), was before a committee of Congress the judges made reply to a similar request as follows:

"The business of the court has frequently been increased by special matters of jurisdiction referred to it by Congress, such as the abandoned and captured property cases, under the act of March 12, 1863; cases against the District of Columbia, under the act of June 16, 1880: and numerous cases and classes of cases referred by private acts. It is found that such cases bring in new litigants and new counsel, who prepare and submit their cases while others are in preparation and do not obstruct the general business. Litigants are always promptly heard whenever their cases are ready for submission, and the court promptly decides them, and the business has never been in arrears; so that the extent of business which the court may transact can hardly be estimated."

Further experience with the business of that act before the court has confirmed the views there expressed.

I have no doubt that the court, with no additional assistance, would be able to do promptly all the business that would come to it if the present bill becomes a law.

I send herewith a copy of the History, Jurisdiction, and Practice of the Court of Claims, from which you will get a full account of the business of the court.

I am, very truly, yours, &c.

WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Chief-Justice.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH, Senator, &c.

I also addressed a letter to the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to ascertain the number of depredation claims and their aggregate amount, and received the following reply:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your interrogatories relative to number, amount, &c., of Indian depredation claims pending in this office, I have the honor to inform you that with the force employed and the amount of other duties devolving upon them, it has been impossible to collect the full and exact data you desire; such facts, however, as the office has been able to collect, and which are believed to be approximately correct, are given.

There are about forty-five hundred claims on file on account of Indian depredations, dating from 1850 to the present time, and they aggregate in amount $13,000,000. Prior to the act of July 15, 1870 (see Revised Statutes, section 2098), claims against Indians for depredations were paid by United States Indian agents. As to what amount was thus paid the office has not been able to ascertain. By an examination of the Statutes at Large, beginning with the act of March 3, 1819 (3 Statutes, page 517), and coming down to the act of March 3, 1885 (23 Statutes, 498), it will be seen that Congress has appropriated by special acts in payment of claims about the sum of $1,654,530.

As to what amount of claims has been allowed by and what amount has been rejected by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior heretofore can not be ascertained within the time desired by you, if in fact it could be ascertained at all in a satisfactory manner, as in many instances the same claim has been disallowed by one Secretary of the Interior and allowed by his successor.

Very respectfully,

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senate.

It will be seen that the number of these claims which have been heretofore filed is about forty-five hundred and the total amount claimed about $13,000,000. Experience justifies the expectation that when these claims are required to undergo investigation in a court, and to be presented in accordance with the rule of pleading and established by evidence taken in such manner as to allow the cross-examination of witnesses, many of them will never be presented; and of those which are presented, when the claims without merit are winnowed out of the whole, their number and amount will be greatly reduced. I do not believe that the total amount of claims which would be allowed under this bill, should the whole thirteen millions be presented, would exceed $5,000,000. To show the probability of a large reduction in the amount of these claims if submitted to the Court of Claims under the provisions of this bill, I submit the following statement:

Claims presented, allowed, and disallowed in various claims tribunals, showing the proportions of claims to allowances.

I.

Southern Claims Commission, under act of March 3, 1871 (16 Statutes, 524):

Amount claimed	$60,258,150 44
Amount allowed	4,636,920 69
Amount rejected	55,621,229 75

(See House Miscellaneous Document No. 30, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.)

II.

Court of Claims, in cases decided from December term, 1867, to December term, 1880:

Amount claimed	$80,315,529 20
Amount allowed	19,770,540 98
Amount rejected	60,544,988 22

(See seventeenth volume Court of Claims Reports, page 11.)

III.

Claims commission under convention with Great Britain of February, 1853 (10 Statutes, 988):

Amount claimed, "millions."
Amount allowed, about	$600,000 00

IV.

Claims commission under convention with Mexico of July 4, 1868 (15 Statutes, 679):

Amount of claims against the United States	$86,661,891 15
Amount allowed in claims against the United States	150,498 41
Amount rejected in claims against the United States	86,511,392 74
Amount of claims against Mexico	470,126,613 40
Amount allowed in claims against Mexico	4,125,622 20
Amount rejected in claims against Mexico	466,000,991 20

(See Senate Executive Document No. 31, Forty-fourth Congress, second session.)

V.

Claims commission under convention with France of January 15, 1880 (21 Statutes, 673):

Amount of claims against the United States	$17,368,151 27
Amount allowed in claims against the United States	625,566 35
Amount rejected in claims against the United States	16,742,584 92
Amount of claims against France	2,427,544 91
Amount allowed in claims against France, 13,659 francs 14 centimes, or about	2,732 00
Amount rejected in claims against France	2,424,812 91

(See House Executive Document No. 235, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, pages 191, 193.)

Claims under the act of July 4, 1864, filed in the office of the Quartermaster-General:

Amount claimed	$41,107,266 48
Amount reported to the Third Auditor under the second section of said act with recommendation for settlement up to March 6, 1886	5,750,119 71
Amount rejected	29,083,554 16
Amount of claims pending at said date	6,273,592 61

Claims filed in the office of the Commissary-General up to March 10, 1886:

Amount claimed	4,944,111 14
Amount recommended to the Third Auditor of the Treasury for settlement under said act to said date	429,533 47
Amount rejected	4,509,704 17
Amount of claims now pending	4,873 50

The bill under consideration is designed to provide a tribunal, open to the citizens of all the States and Territories, authorized to hear and determine their claims according to the law and the facts. It is a measure demanded by every principle of justice and good faith on the part of the Government.

The people of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, in my judgment, have an exceptional claim upon the Government for indemnification for losses occasioned by Indian depredations, growing out of the causes which led to the settlement and occupation of the Oregon Territory by American citizens, the inducements held out by the Government to settlers in that Territory, and the causes which led to Indian hostilities there.

It is well known that the title to the territory which comprised what is now Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, lying west of the Rocky Mountains and north of latitude 42° north, was for a long time in dispute. It was claimed at different times by Russia, Spain, Great Britain, and the United States. Russia's claim rested on occupation by fur traders, and its southern boundary was undefined. She had established a fur-trading post in Northern California at an early day.

By a treaty ratified by the United States in 1825 the line between the territory claimed by the United States and that claimed by Russia was fixed at 54° 40′ north latitude. Great Britain, claiming the territory south of that line, made haste to negotiate a similar treaty, defining 54° 40′ north latitude as her northern boundary.

The claim of Spain to this country rested upon alleged discovery backed by occupation. Spain transferred her interests to France, and in 1803 Napoleon sold Louisiana to the United States, and by the Florida purchase latitude 42° north was fixed as the boundary between Spain and the United States on the Pacific coast, and thereafter the controversy concerning the title to the territory was between the United States and Great Britain. The claim of Great Britain to the country by discovery was indefensible, but as early as 1793 English fur traders in private employ pushed into the Oregon country and established trading posts there, but made no attempts at permanent settlement south of 49° north latitude.

The claim of the United States rested upon the doubtful claim acquired from Spain, the voyage of Capt. Robert Gray, of Boston, who in 1792 entered and explored to some distance from its mouth the River Saint Roque, the name of which he changed to Columbia, the name of his ship, and the exploration of Lewis and Clarke, who, under orders from President Jefferson, crossed the continent, floated down the Columbia, wintered at Young's River, near the mouth of the Columbia, and explored much of the Oregon country.

The treaty with Russia fixing, as against the Russian claim to the territory, latitude 54° 40′ north as the northern boundary of the possessions of the United States, created in the United States a belief that was our true boundary as against Great Britain, and the Oregon boundary was for many years an absorbing question in the politics of the country. It formed the subject of political platforms and political campaigns; it threatened to involve us in a war with Great Britain; the Monroe doctrine was invoked against allowing Great Britain's claim to any part of the Pacific coast. It became apparent to the people of the United States and to the Government that the question of title would be eventually determined by actual occupation. By the convention of August 6, 1827, the joint occupation of the Oregon country by the United States and Great Britain was continued indefinitely, with a provision that either party might annul and abrogate it upon giving twelve months' notice to the other, and from that time forward until the Northwestern boundary was finally settled by the treaty of 1846 occupation became an important factor in determining the question of title. The condition of the western half of North America at the time Captain Gray discovered and explored the Columbia River is thus graphically described in an article published in the Daily Morning Oregonian of Portland, January 1, 1886:

With the anniversary of another century, in the year 1792, exactly three hundred years after Columbus discovered the New World, and two hundred and fifty years after the first Spanish navigator sailed up the west shore of Oregon, an American shipmaster discovered the great river of the west.

Up to that time the western half of North America was so unknown that from the Gulf of California to the icy pole there was scarce a trace of civilization. That little was where Jesuit missions to the far south were striving to bring up from untold ages of vice and degradation the miserable native hordes that peopled the choicest regions of the West. These efforts were only then commenced. If one could have stood on the great divide from whence the melting snows turn westward, the view would have been unbroken by one single touch of enterprise, with not a trace of civilization to mar the perfection of its savagery. The Indian with bow and arrow followed the chase, or with spear and net sought a food-supply from the waters. And somewhere, on that vast expanse of wilderness, hostile bands were always on the war-path. The war-whoop and the savage yell waked many a scene of night, and flames of torture blazed to mark each victory. The Indian of this far West may have heard some rumor of the white man's coming, but on all the hills and plains and through all the mountain wastes, from Athabasca's snows to California's perennial summer times, the native tribes were, as their fathers had been before them, barbarian and savage beyond recall.

How great the change that time has wrought! Immigration has swept across the continent; civilization has taken the place of barbarism, the arts of peace of perpetual warfare; the then wilderness has become the home of millions of intelligent, law-abiding, and liberty-loving, industrious, and prosperous citizens, and the native hordes which then roamed over that vast territory are confined upon reservations and are kept under Government control. This change has not taken place, and in the nature of things could not take place, entirely peacefully. The conflict between civilization and savage life is irrepressible. It needs no prophet to foretell that one or the other must prevail. Civilization or extermination is the fate of the remnant of the Indians.

The occupation of the territory was favored by the Government. As we have seen, peaceful occupation by American citizens was provided for in the treaty with Great Britain; Government expeditions were sent to explore the country; Government protection was afforded to immigrants crossing the plains; the patriotism of the people was appealed to, and to induce immigration to aid the settlement of the country Congress passed an act, approved September 27, 1850, commonly known as the donation law, granting to every settler upon the public lands who was such prior to September 1, 1850, a donation of the quantity of a half-section, or 320 acres of land, if a single man, and, if married, the quantity of an entire section, or 640 acres, one-half to the husband and the other half to the wife in her own right, and to such as should become settlers between September 1, 1850, and December 1, 1855, the quantity of a quarter-section to a single man, and, if married, a half section, one-half to the husband and the other half to the wife in her own right.

Prior to 1830 several unsuccessful attempts were made by American fur companies to establish and maintain posts in the Territory, but they failed on account of the opposition and rivalry of established British companies. Immigration began in 1832, and after 1838 each year there were large additions to the permanent settlements of the country by companies of enterprising persons, who had braved the perils and endured the hardships of the long and tedious journey across the continent to establish homes for themselves and hold the country for the United States.

The increasing American immigration added to the perils of joint occupation, and it is firmly believed by many that some of the Indian massacres and depredations were incited by those unfriendly to American occupation of the Territory. While it was the policy of Congress to induce the settlement of Oregon by the whites and to continue the joint occupation until the United States should be able, with the aid of the American population of the Territory, to assert and maintain an exclusive right to it, the settlers were from the first left without adequate protection by the Government. The pioneer population of the region suffered greatly at first from the inability of the Government to afford them protection, and afterward from its indifference and inaction. From the commencement of American immigration for the purpose of permanent occupation, and from the time it became apparent that Great Britain could not compete with the United States in the settlement of the country, Indian massacres of emigrants commenced. In 1834, on the Umpqua River, a party of thirty white persons were treacherously and brutally murdered. This was followed by the massacre of Dr. Whitman and his twenty-seven companions, near Walla Walla, by the Cayuse and Walla Wallas in 1847. These outbreaks were followed by murders of immigrants by bands of Modocs in 1852, by the Southern Oregon Indian war in 1853, the Rogue River and Jacksonville wars in 1855 and 1856, raids of marauding bands of Snakes in Eastern Oregon in 1858–'59, the marauding massacres, murders, and thefts by the Snakes in Eastern Oregon and Washington in 1865–'70, the Modoc outbreak in 1872–'73, and the Nez Percé war of 1878.

In 1858 a committee was appointed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Oregon and directed to examine and report in regard to depredations upon immigrants in 1854, the number and dates, places and names of persons killed by Oregon Indians in time of peace and those killed in time of war by Indians supposed to be friendly. The committee made a report February 3, 1858, giving the names and dates of persons killed and names of the tribes doing the killing. The following is taken from the concluding portion of the report:

It will be seen by the foregoing list that prior to 1851 upward of fifty citizens were murdered by Oregon Indians. Since 1851 upward of one hundred and fifty citizens have been murdered by the Indians of Southern Oregon and their immediate allies, and about fifty by the Indians of Northern Oregon and their allies. Many more names could be obtained from papers and living witnesses, but your committee have not time to investigate any further.

Recapitulation: Killed in 1834, 30; in 1835, 4; in 1846, 1; in 1847, 16; in 1850, 8; in 1851, 12; in 1852, 50; in 1853, 11; in 1854, 29; in 1855, 51; in 1856, 45; in 1857, 5. Total, 262.

Isolated from civilization, neglected by the General Government, surrounded by savage foes, the pioneers of Oregon demonstrated to a remarkable degree the self-reliance, the undaunted courage, endurance, and capacity for self-government of the American people. It is for these brave men who penetrated the wilderness, took possession of the Oregon Territory and planted civilization there; who defended their hearth-stones against savage foes incited by the emissaries of foreign powers; who laid the foundation of prosperous States and Territories that are, and the powerful and wealthy States that are to be, and for the widows and orphans of those who lost their lives by the neglect of the Government that I plead to-day. I demand for them the same treatment accorded to all the citizens of the Republic for a period of over sixty years from the organization of the Government. The time will come when this demand will be heeded, and provision will be made for determining the amounts of their losses by Indian depredations and for the payment of their claims. How much better it would be to make such provision now, while the evidence can be found to sift the false from the true, and while the money will be available to relieve the necessities of the original claimants.

If the committee favors the payment of these claims and the bill offered by me does not provide the best means for ascertaining the amounts thereof, let them devise a better plan and speedily present it to the Senate. If it is proposed to repudiate all liability on the part of the Government for damages for such losses, I hope nevertheless a report will speedily be made, that the opinion of the Senate may be taken on the question. The present condition of these claims is very unsatisfactory. An occasional bill for relief is passed; other claimants do not understand why the Government should make a distinction between its citizens. They press their claims upon members of Congress at each session; bills are introduced for their relief; Congress takes no action; and the same thing is repeated at the next session. If an obligation on the part of the Government to pay these claims exists, a great injustice is being done to the claimants by the inaction of Congress. If there is, in the opinion of Congress, no obligation to pay them and no intention of paying them, let us say so and not evade the question longer. But, sir, as I have said, the obligation exists. The people whose cause I present to-day do not come as suppliants for the bounty of the Government, but as suitors for what, by every principle of justice, is theirs.

I do not beg, I demand for them what the Government justly owes them. I charge Congress with the virtual repudiation of an obligation of the Government as sacred as its obligation to pay its outstanding bonds. I charge it with having repudiated this obligation at a time and under circumstances which make a most unjust discrimination against the people of the far West, under circumstances which have the appearance of selfishness upon the part of the majority of Congress, and indifference to its obligation to the brave and loyal men by whose enterprise and energy civilization has been extended over the western slope of the continent. Their demand may not be granted; my feeble presentation of their claims may not even disturb the Committee on Indian Affairs in the even tenor of their way. The bill under consideration may be consigned, with the others introduced by me which have preceded it, to the files of the committee, to sleep the sleep of death; but I have done my duty in presenting the cause of as meritorious a class of claimants as ever sought relief from Congress. They will never understand why the Government so suddenly changed its policy, and why their claims have been repudiated. They will not cease to demand from Congress what they conceive to be their due; and if their claims shall be now ignored and relief denied them, let no one imagine that they will cease from troubling Congress. The claims are just. If not paid before, after the present claimants shall have passed from the stage of action and the claims are represented by their children and grandchildren, and when the Territories of the West have been admitted to the Union and are represented in both Houses of Congress, their united strength, backed by the uniform practice of the Government for so many years and the justice of these claims, will succeed in accomplishing what, from their numerical weakness, the delegation in Congress from the remote West is unable to accomplish to-day.

Mr. President, I now submit as a part of my remarks a list of special appropriations for payment of Indian depredation claims, as follows:

SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

Appropriations for Indian depredation claims:

The following is a list of special appropriations for payment of Indian depredation claims. In each case it is stated whether payment is to be made from the Treasury or from the Indian annuities. The total of amounts appropriated from the Treasury is $1,664,028.25; the total appropriated from Indian annuities is $197,716.37. But these totals do not embrace the sums appropriated from the Treasury by several acts (March 2, 1827; May 31, 1830; June 30, 1834), in which the amounts are not specified:

By act of March 3, 1819 (section 5, 3 Statutes, 517), $4,000 is appropriated from the Treasury to satisfy claims of citizens of the United States for property stolen or destroyed by the Osages.

By act of March 2, 1827 (6 Statutes 361), William Morrison, late contractor for supplies to the Army, is allowed credit (out of the Treasury) for sixty-nine beef cattle taken from near the military post of Prairie Du Chien in July, 1816, by certain predatory tribes of Indians.

By act of March 25, 1830 (6 Statutes 408), the Secretary of War is directed to pay $6,703 from the Treasury to four persons for property taken by the Osage Indians from 1816 to 1823.

By act of May 31 1830 (4 Statutes 428), certain depredation claims are referred to the Third Auditor to be decided according to the provisions of section 14 of the act of March 30, 1802, the money to be paid out of the Treasury.

By act of March 2, 1831 (4 Statutes 470), $1,300 is appropriated from the Treasury for payment of sundry claims for Indian depredations.

By act of June 28, 1834 (4 Statutes, 705), $7,800 is appropriated from the Treasury to defray the expense of investigating claims against the Seminoles for property stolen or destroyed by them and for liquidating such as may be satisfactorily established.

By act of June 30, 1834 (4 Statutes, 721), payment not exceeding $250,000 is granted out of the Treasury to citizens of Georgia for claims founded upon the capture and detention or destruction of property by Creek Indians prior to the act of March 30, 1802.

By act of June 30, 1834 (6 Statutes, 581), certain claims for Indian depredation are referred to the Secretary of War, who is directed to pay out of the Treasury all which shall be established.

By act of July 1, 1836 (6 Statutes, 659), $403 is appropriated from the Treasury to James Alexander, and $575 to Ira Nash for losses sustained and depredations committed by Sac and Fox Indians in 1814.

By act of July 2, 1836 (6 Statutes, 671), the Secretary of War is directed to pay to Joesph Bogy $6,000 from the Indian annuities for his merchandise and property taken or destroyed by the Choctaw Indians in 1807.

By act of March 3, 1837 (5 Statutes, 158–162), the President is directed to report to Congress as to depredations committed by the Seminoles and Creeks, before and after the recent Indian war.

By act of March 3, 1841 (6 Statutes, 822), the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay out of the Treasury, to Avery, Saltmarsh & Co., mail contractors, $9,779, for property employed by them in transporting the mail, captured and destroyed by the Creek Indians in May, 1836.

By act of June 15, 1844 (6 Statutes, 913), the Secretary of War is directed to pay to George Wallis $3,000, out of the Indian annuities, for the destruction of cattle belonging to the said Wallis by the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indians.

By act of August 9, 1846 (9 Statutes, 24 Private), $1,500 is appropriated from the Indian annuities to pay to the legal representatives of Cyrus Turner for depredations committed by Sioux Indians.

By act of March 2, 1847 (9 Statutes, 41 Private), $1,081 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Elijah White and others for property taken by the Pawnee Indians.

By act of March 3, 1847 (9 Statutes, 41 Private), $676.91 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Joseph E. Primeau and Thomas J. Chapman for depredations committed by Yankton Indians.

By act of August 14, 1848 (9 Statutes, 90, Private), $800 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Charles N. Gibson for a wagon captured and destroyed by the Seminole Indians in Middle Florida in February, 1839.

By act of March 3, 1849 (9 Statutes 141, Private), $4,155 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Thomas Talbot and others for property taken by the Pawnee Indians.

By act of August 30, 1852 (10 Statutes, 41, 55), $1,200 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay James M. Marsh for losses for property taken by the Sioux Indians while extending the line of surveys under contract.

By act of January 18, 1855 (10 Statutes, 843), $500 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Moses D. Hogan for cattle taken by the Indians.

By act of August 18, 1856 (11 Statutes, 65, 81), the Secretary of the Interior is ordered to investigate claims for depredations by Indians in New Mexico.

By act of March 16, 1858 (11 Statutes, 527), the sum of $200, with interest from the 1st day of June, 1852, was appropriated from the Treasury to pay John Hamilton, of Champaign County, Ohio, for his time and services during his imprisonment with the Indians in the war of 1812 with Great Britain.

By act of June 19, 1860 (12 Statutes, 44, 58), $16,679.74 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay for the loss and destruction of property of citizens of Minnesota and Iowa at Spirit Lake in 1857, by Sioux Indians.

By act of March 2, 1861 (12 Statutes, 203), $9,640.74 is appropriated from the Treasury to indemnify citizens of Iowa and Minnesota for destruction of property at or near Spirit Lake by Inkpadutah's band of Sioux Indians.

By act of February 16, 1863 (12 Statutes, 652, 658), provision is made for payment out of their forfeited annuities for damages done by Sioux Indians in Minnesota on the occasion of the Sioux massacre in 1862.

By act of May 28, 1864 (13 Statutes, 92), $928,411 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay the awards of the commission under the act of February 16, 1863, for damages done by the Sioux Indians in 1862, and a further sum of $241,963 is appropriated for additional claims.

By act of June 29, 1866 (14 Statutes, 609), $28,175 is appropriated from the Treasury for Elizabeth Woodward and George Chorpenning for destruction of property by Indians 1862, and by the second section of the same act $26,370 is appropriated from the Indian annuities to pay George Chorpenning for property destroyed by Indians prior to April 1, 1856.

By act of March 2, 1868 (15 Statutes, 356), $400 is appropriated from the Treasury to the widow of Maj. Gen. I. B. Richardson for one mule and four horses stolen from him by Apache Indians while on military duty in New Mexico.

By act of April 10, 1869 (16 Statutes., 13, 39), $10,906.34 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay for depredations committed by Indians in Northwestern Iowa in 1857.

By act of February 27, 1871 (16 Statutes., 704), $2,564.10 is appropriated out of any money appropriated for the benefit of the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians, to Lucy A. Smith, for losses by depredations of said Indians in Nebraska.

By act of May 7, 1872 (17 Statutes, 395), commissioners are appointed to examine into depredations committed by Indians and Mexicans in Texas.

By act of May 21, 1872 (17 Statutes, 661), $14,650 is appropriated from the Treasury to indemnify Charles F. Tracy for depredations committed by Apaches in May, 1870.

By act of June 5, 1872 (17 Statutes, 675), $10,000 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Mrs. Fanny Kelly for property taken and destroyed by Sioux Indians in 1864.

By act of June 10, 1872 (17 Statutes, 690), $30,000 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay the heirs of Alexander Watson for property lost, captured, or destroyed in Florida during the Indian hostilities commanding in 1825.

By act of June 10, 1872 (17 Statutes, 701), $13,200 is appropriated from the Treasury to Elbridge Gerry for valuable services rendered the Government in 1864, and for all claims for Indian depredations up to the date of the passage of this act.

By act of March 3, 1873 (17 Statutes, 766), $2,250 is appropriated from the Treasury to Mrs. Ann Marble, administratrix, for losses by depredations by Cheyenne Indians.

By act of April 28, 1874 (18 Statutes, 543), $1,095.37 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Mrs. Siloma Deck for losses by depredations by Sioux Indians in 1862.

By act of March 3, 1875 (18 Statutes, 424), $2,500 each is appropriated to Adelaide German and Julia German, two white children captured in Kansas, the same to be withheld from annuities due the Cheyennes.

By act of March 3, 1877 (19 Statutes, 549), $2,283.92 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Hans C. Peterson for damages by Sioux Indians in Minnesota in 1862.

By act of March 3, 1879 (20 Statutes, 396), $2,915 with interest at 7 per cent. is appropriated from any treaty funds of the Kiowa Indians, to the heirs of Abel S. Lee for property taken and destroyed by the Kiowa Indians in 1872.

By act of March 3, 1879 (20 Statutes, 396), $5,000 is appropriated out of any money hereafter appropriated for the use and benefit of the Cheyenne Indians, to Mrs. Celia C. Short.

By act of June 8, 1880 (21 Statutes, 549), $15,867.50 is appropriated to pay Henry Warren for damages sustained by depredations of Indians in 1871, while Warren was a Government contractor, the same to be withheld from the amounts due the Indians.

By act of June 16, 1880 (21 Statutes, 588), $2,000 is appropriated from the annuities due the Cheyenne or Arapaho Indians to Amanda M. Cook, whose mother was killed and herself captured by the Indians in 1865.

By act of March 3, 1881 (21 Statutes, 640), $58,659.46 is appropriated from the Treasury to pay Dodd, Brown, & Co., assignees of E. M. Durfee & Co., and others, for depredations committed by various tribes of Indians, the amounts to be deducted from the annuities.

By act of May 17, 1882 (22 Statutes, 86), $9,870.10 is appropriated from unexpended balances of treaty funds to pay various claimants for damages caused by a raid of Northern Cheyennes.

By act of March 3, 1883 (22 Statutes, 804), $12,200 is appropriated from moneys due the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians to Powers & Newman and D. and B. Powers for depredations committed by these Indians.

By act of March 20, 1884 (23 Statutes, 525), $5,400 was appropriated from the Treasury to pay Louisa Boddy for depredations committed by the Modoc Indians.

By act of March 3, 1885 (23 Statutes, 498), $46,770.21 is appropriated to pay W. C. Oburn out of annuities for depredations committed by the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians.

I ask now that the bill introduced by me to-day be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and if that is the proper reference for a bill to make an appropriation for the payment of claims audited and allowed I ask also that Senate bill 1820 go to the same committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interfere with the proper disposition of the Senator's bill, but it seems to me that it being a bill conferring jurisdiction over certain matters on the Court of Claims it is in the nature of a bill requiring the care of the Judiciary Committee. Would it not be well to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. DOLPH. I think the controlling and important question is whether we are going to make provision for disposing of these claims. That I suppose ought to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. But as far as regards the mere question of whether this is a proper tribunal or not, and whether the provisions of the bill are proper to enable the Court of Claims to dispose of the subject matter properly, probably that is a judicial question, but it is not the important question involved in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course after the proper laws have been passed and regulations provided for the investigation of these claims and they have been adjudicated, then I suppose it would be proper that a provision making an appropriation for their payment should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me there is very little in this measure that requires it to be considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is not specially the relations of the Indians to the Government that would determine the question involved in the bill. It is a broader question, affecting the general duty of the United States to its own citizens, not growing out of any particular relation of the Indians to the United States, whether the United States will take money out of its Treasury to pay its own citizens for losses they have sustained at the hands of Indians. That is a question which I do not see that the Committee on Indian Affairs are especially called on to consider. It is a question broader than anything that the Indian Committee considers. It considers as to the treatment of the Indians themselves. This is the treatment of citizens of the United States by the United States; and so far as the Indian Committee is concerned, I am quite certain it would prefer that the Senate should come to a conclusion, and the Judiciary Committee, of all other committees, it seems to me should consider that question.

Mr. DOLPH. I will consent that it shall go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and if that committee think it ought to be reported back and sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs, that will do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope it will not go to the Committee on the Judiciary, first because I think it relates really to the general Indian question with which the Committee on Indian Affairs as at present constituted is more familiar than any former committee I have ever known in my experience here, and possesses the entire confidence of the Senate as to its thoroughness and impartiality. It is really an Indian question, or related to the Indian question.

Then as to the Committee on the Judiciary, I am bound to say that we are so overburdened with matters now under consideration that it could not be expected that we should be able to take this thing up out of its order, and probably we should be unable to do anything about it at this session at all.

Mr. DAWES. I want to say, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States has separated the Indians from this question by statute. It has definitely, so far as I understand it, determined that the United States are not to take out of their Treasury money to pay for these depredations in the absence of funds in their possession belonging to Indians; and so far as these claims are concerned, in so far as I have been able to examine them, they lay against, if at all, Indians who have no funds in our hands; and it is a question, if they are to be paid at all, whether they are to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and that is a broad question of the duty of the United States to its citizens. The Indian has passed out of connection with it by a statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let it go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAWES. So far as the examination of each claim goes, that is as to the extent of it, to ascertain whether it is a just claim and how much is due in each particular case, it would be just as impossible for the Indian Committee to discharge that duty as for the Judiciary Committee. I know the Judiciary Committee is crowded with business, and so is the Committee on Indian Affairs. There are at this moment forty-one bills before that committee which are styled Indian depredations claims, which have come here reported from the Secretary of the Interior, and the question at the bottom of them all is whether it is the duty of the United States to respond from its Treasury to meet such claims. The Committee on Indian Affairs are waiting the decision or recommendation of some proper committee upon that point, and will be governed by that; but for the Committee on Indian Affairs to put itself up as a committee on claims or a court of claims to revise these claims, it would be impossible for it to do so.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say, in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, that there is no necessity for that at all. The statute provides how these claims shall be proved, and all these claims that are recognized in the Interior Department as having any standing at all have been proved according to the provisions of the statute, and all claims not so proved are not certified or not treated as legitimate claims in behalf of the parties who are claiming. There is a great number of claims made informally that have never been proved up; but the list sent here is the list of claims proved according to the statute. That process has already been gone through. There is no necessity for any committee of this body to determine that question.

The point simply is, will the Government of the United States do what it did prior to 1859, make good these depredations either out of money belonging to the Indians or out of its Treasury? When that is determined, it is barely possible that there may be some necessity for a further scrutiny of some of these claims; but that can be had after the first question is determined; and the only matter I think that is worthy of consideration now is, shall the Government make good either out of the moneys it holds in trust for the Indians where it does hold any, or where it does not hold any such moneys out of its own Treasury, to the citizens of the Western country these losses growing out of Indian depredations which the Government always did pay prior to 1859.

Mr. DAWES. Without doubt the question presented by the Senator from Colorado stands at the front and must be decided to begin with, and therefore it had better be decided before any committee is charged with any duty of re-examining these claims. The Senator seems to think that as these claims are reported from the Interior Department, it will hardly be necessary to go back of that report. I have not gone into the late report—the report made at this session—enough to be able to express an opinion on that; but I heard the Senator from Oregon a little while ago speak of a report that was made to the other body, whereby I think he said $3,000,000 of claims had been reduced to $50,000.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him, unless the Senator from Oregon will explain that.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to make a suggestion without repeating what I said. This is a question that we can not with safety to ourselves ignore much longer. In the volume before me [exhibiting], the special report of the Interior Department on this class of claims, there are four thousand five hundred claims, and they aggregate $15,000,000. As I said, most of these claims have been examined and reported favorably by the Secretary of the Interior to Congress in his annual reports on Indian depredation claims. At the last session of Congress in the Indian appropriation bill we made an appropriation of $10,000, and I think, although it is somewhat doubtful, authorized the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior to re-examine into them. In part response to that resolution he has sent this letter, embracing a list of all these claims, stating against what tribes they are preferred and the amount claimed. I understand that on the 3d of this month he sent another letter, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, in which he stated that he had examined claims amounting to $3,000,000 and had ruled out all but $50,000 of the $3,000,000.

That, however, is hearsay. I have not seen the report, but it is stated that he ruled them out on the ground that they were barred by the limitation contained in section 17 of the act of 1834, which was certainly expressly repealed by the Revised Statutes, and I think was impliedly repealed when we ceased to pay these claims out of the Treasury and out of the annuities. If that decision stands there will be not only forty-one bills, but there will be forty-one hundred bills before the Committee on Indian Affairs at the next session of Congress asking payment of these claims on the ground that they have been ruled out by this new ruling of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and are not to be reported as audited by the Secretary of the Interior to Congress, and they will all come here for private relief.

It is time Congress said, "We will not pay these claims at all; we will repudiate this obligation, although we have held out this hope all the while, although we have authorized these claims to be submitted to the Interior Department, and proved and audited and reported to Congress for the last quarter of a century;" we had better either stop now and say, "We will never pay any of them," and cease passing an occasional bill for private relief, or make some provision for paying. We are bound to do that for our own protection, because if this new ruling stands of the Secretary of the Interior ruling out on re-examination the claims audited and reported favorably, then the parties will come to Congress for relief; and that renders the creation of some tribunal which can treat these questions necessary, I think, to which all these claims may be submitted without regard to the question when they were submitted to the Interior Department. It is an important matter, and I am only desirous to have it go to a committee that will give it attention. As I say, the important question is, will we pay claims, or provide a tribunal to investigate and determine the amounts that are due? The mere machinery by which we do that is one thing and is a question of minor importance.

Mr. DAWES. I have no disposition to give this subject the go-by by any means. I have been appalled by the book that has been sent up here and by the oppressive burden of these claims that have been for years knocking at the door of the committee-room of the Committee on Indian Affairs, for there it seems they have gone; I do not know why; nor do I desire to reflect at all upon the labor heretofore expended by the Interior Department upon the examination of these claims. With the material at their command, and with the money appropriated for it, they have done all they could heretofore and this present year; but in the nature of the case, the longer they are investigated the less each one of these claims, speaking as a rule, will be likely to be. They are of a kind which, when you come to sift them, will bear a great deal of reduction. Yet there is a vast amount of honest claims on somebody by the citizens of the United States which demand a hearing and demand of the United States some sort of response to that application.

The applicants ought to know what to expect. They can not get any sum amounting to anything from any annuities in the Treasury or any trust funds there, for the claims as a general thing are against that body of Indians who have long since spent all their money that was in the Treasury, and they have got to come, if at all, out of the United States Treasury directly; and if we can once establish the policy of the United States toward them, if it be adverse to them, they ought to know it.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator will allow me a word. He speaks about the Indians having spent their annuities. The annuities have been paid to the Indians from year to year and expended by them notwithstanding there are stipulations in the treaties that they should be applied on these claims.

Mr. DAWES. While claims enough to exhaust the annuities have been pending ten or fifteen years, we have paid out their annuities and trust funds all that time, and passed a law that there should be no moneys taken out of their trust funds except by a special appropriation passed under another law that would not pay them out of the Treasury or something of that kind. So we have left these people totally ignorant upon the question whether they were to be recompensed or not.

I am not saying a word against them, because I know that very many of them have honest claims against somebody. Whether the United States will ever feel that they can take the money out of their Treasury and make these citizens whole I do not think ought to be a matter to be considered, in the first instance, by the Indian Committee; for whether that be wise or not has nothing to do with the treatment of the Indian; it is outside of that. While the Indian Committee—I do not speak for myself; all the rest of them—are very industrious and hardworking members and are willing to do their whole duty, they think that it will be utterly impossible for them to pay proper attention to this question involved in limine, upon the threshold, before we go into the examination of how much each claim is, whether it is a claim that anybody can pay after it is found out that the Indian has nothing. I want that settled. I want it settled before any committee is overwhelmed with the four thousand claims, every one of which they have got to examine to some extent.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to make a statement in regard to the law which was passed for the payment of these claims out of the Treasury. We did not pass any law that they should not be paid out of the Treasury, nor could we, for we have been constantly paying them at every session by special bills. The law we passed was that the Secretary of the Treasury should not pay them out of the Treasury without an appropriation by Congress, as was done prior to 1859.

Mr. DAWES. That is the general law; but as the Senator says, sometimes a claimant who has the good fortune to have a friend in Congress that will press his claim has got his claim through to be paid out of the Treasury, and that is spread abroad among the other claimants and they come here, and two more in place of that one get a rebuff and are told they can not be paid out of the Treasury. That is the trouble. Once in a while we pay one of these claimants out of the Treasury and all the others want to know why they are not treated in the same way, and they come here and spend their money and their time in advancing what they think is an honest claim against somebody, and in the end they are turned off.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, may I inquire what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The reference of the bill under consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that 2 o'clock has arrived and the unfinished business should be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill of the Senator from Oregon will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Chair hears no objection. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like a reference of the other bill while we are upon it.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the President to announce that there was no objection to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I do not know but that it is too late to raise an objection now, but I should like the yeas and nays on that question. I do not think it is a matter that the Committee on Indian Affairs are called upon to consider.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would rather they should not do it if they are not called upon to do it.

Mr. DAWES. It belongs to the Judiciary Committee, I should think.

SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolutions; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That R. A. Fennel, a Democrat, heretofore employed as a skilled laborer on the Senate roll of employés, who was discharged by the Sergeant-at-Arms without cause except to make place for a Republican, be reinstated on the roll of Senate employés.

2. Resolved, That the Republican majority of the Senate will allow the Democratic minority the same number of Senate employés with the same proportion of salaries as were allowed by the Democratic majority to the Republican minority in 1879.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES. When the Senate adjourned yesterday it was the understanding that we should go into executive session at an early hour to-day. I yielded, however, for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to make the remarks which he has made. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] appeals to me to postpone my motion to go into executive session until he submits some remarks on the interstate-commerce bill, which is the pending order.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. As a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce which reported the bill before the Senate, I desire to give notice to the Senate that after to-day, at the next sitting, I shall ask the Senate to renew the consideration of the bill and to continue its consideration from day to day until it is disposed of, in the hope that we may get it out of the way so that it will not be in the road of other bills that are being pressed before the Senate. I hope the Senate will bear in mind and allow the bill to be taken up on Monday, if we shall adjourn over until then, and will continue its consideration from day to day, if it requires more than one day, until it is finally disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it right to say, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that there are subjects of pressing importance for consideration of the Senate acting with closed doors, which all the Senators understand, that have been pending a great deal longer than interstate commerce has, and that ought to be attended to, and therefore I shall put in my caveat for one that, now that we are not bound by courtesy to yield to my friend from West Virginia, I trust we shall proceed from day to day until we dispose of the pressing matters in executive session. That will be for the Senate to determine when the motion is made.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as I have been able to perceive there is not very much disposition to discuss the bill before the Senate at length; and I think if the Senate would allow its consideration for a day or a little more we should soon be able to dispose of it; and the Senator from Vermont can then get the floor for executive business, so far as I am concerned, as long as he wants to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I share the anxiety which the Senator from Vermont manifests to dispose of the executive business before the Senate. I can not, however, resist the appeal which the Senator from West Virginia makes to me that he be allowed to occupy the floor for a short time on the pending bill, and I give notice that at the end of his remarks I will then move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, the remarks I propose to make relate chiefly to the provisions of the fourth section of this bill, which I conceive to be its most important feature, and as I have proposed an amendment which materially affects its general application, I prefer to introduce it into the general discussion now in order that it may have its share of consideration along with the provisions of the bill as a whole.

The committee appointed by the Senate to investigate and report upon the subject of interstate commerce has performed its duty laboriously and with marked ability, and has submitted with its report a large amount of most interesting and useful information upon this important subject.

There is no longer any doubt that the interests of commerce and the demands of the country require effective legislation to equalize and regulate transportation. Public opinion as well as the railroads themselves have made marked progress in this direction in the past few years. The report of the committee only echoes the almost unanimous sentiment upon this subject when it says—I quote from page 175 of report:

It is the deliberate judgment of the committee that upon no public question are the people so nearly unanimous as upon the proposition that Congress should undertake in some way the regulation of interstate commerce. Omitting those who speak for the railroad interests, there is practically no difference of opinion as to the necessity and importance of such action by Congress, and this is fully substantiated by the testimony accompanying this report, which is a fair consensus of public sentiment upon the question. The committee has found among the leading representatives of the railroad interests an increasing readiness to accept the aid of Congress in working out the solution of the railroad problem which has obstinately baffled all their efforts, and not a few of the ablest railroad men of the country seem disposed to look to the intervention of Congress as promising to afford the best means of ultimately securing a more equitable and satisfactory adjustment of the relations of the transportation interests to the community than they themselves have been able to bring about.

The evidence upon this point is so conclusive that the committee has no hesitation in declaring that prompt action by Congress upon this important subject is almost unanimously demanded by public sentiment.

I assume, therefore, that there is no longer much difference of opinion upon the wisdom and necessity of Congress passing a bill to regulate interstate commerce, and, in my judgment, the committee has submitted with its report a bill which, in its main features, will meet the approbation of the country.

The methods for carrying out and enforcing the provisions of the bill by creating a Government bureau in the Interior Department for that purpose will, I think, be regarded with particular favor for the reason that it establishes a tribunal under the control of the Government to enforce its provisions without cost to individual shippers. No matter how wise and efficient any law for this purpose may be in its provisions, if its execution depends upon the efforts of individuals to enforce it many violations would be submitted to rather than incur the expense and trouble of seeking redress in the courts.

But, Mr. President, it is not my object to discuss the general features of the bill that has already occupied the attention of the Senate. My object is to call the attention of the Senate to the fourth section of the bill as reported by the committee, and to urge the adoption of the amendment proposed by me to that section.

I will ask the Secretary to report the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 4 from the first to the eighteenth lines, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, as provided in the first section of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance, which includes the shorter distance, on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation."

Mr. CAMDEN. The fourth section as it now stands in the bill is as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggrgate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, and from the same original point of departure: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time make general rules covering exceptions to any such common carrier, in cases where there is competition by river, sea, canal, or lake, exempting such designated common carrier in such special cases from the operation of this section of this act; and when such exceptions shall have been made and published they shall have like force and effect as though the same had been specified in this section.

Any common carrier who shall violate the provisions of this section of this act shall be deemed guilty of extortion, and shall be liable to the person or persons against whom any such excessive charge was made for all damages occasioned by such violation.

The provision contained in the section, as reported, to prohibit charging more for a shorter than a longer haul does not go far enough to provide against the evils of discrimination most largely complained of by shippers all over the country.

At the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress, when a bill somewhat similar to the one now under consideration was before the Senate, but which did not contain any provision to regulate charges for long and short hauls, I advocated an amendment substantially the same as the one now proposed.

I have always been of the decided opinion that a provision prohibiting the charging more for a shorter than a longer haul, which embraced the shorter haul, embodied the most important feature that could be embraced in any bill for the regulation of transportation, and I am more and more impressed every day with the comprehensive justice and importance of such a provision, unqualified by limitations and exceptions. In my opinion it is the key to the whole transportation problem to prevent discriminations and to force the railroads to properly adjust rates from competing points. The principle is fair to both railroads and shippers under all circumstances, and there should be no exceptions to the rule.

The fourth section of the bill as reported is intended to recognize this principle, but its limitations and provisos destroy its force and value, and renders it inadequate to meet the universal demands of all sections of the country upon this subject. The committee in its report recognizes this principle.

RATES ON LONG AND SHORT HAULS.

The most popular remedy proposed for the prevention of unjust discriminations between places and persons on account of distance has been what is called a "short-haul law," or the prohibition of a greater aggregate charge for a shorter than for a longer distance as between shipments of the same kind over the same road and going in the same direction.

No question connected with the problem of railroad regulation has given the committee more perplexity than that relating to the utility and expediency of legislation prohibiting a carrier from charging more for a shorter than for a longer haul under any circumstances; not that we have any doubt as to the injustice of such a charge under most circumstances, but because it seems inexpedient to enforce such a regulation under all circumstances.

Palpable discriminations, peculiar to no State or locality, but too common, apparently, to all, would seem to be remedied by such a provision. It is asked for and urged to preclude the carriers from reimbursing out of local rates and shippers what they lose by reckless and needless competition upon through rates. It is too plain to be made plainer by argument that, within certain limits and under certain oft-occurring conditions, the provision would be a useful and fair one.

It does not seem as if there could be any justification for charging one shipper more for hauling a car of grain 50 miles than he or another is at the same time charged for hauling another car of grain 100 miles over the same road and in the same direction. The unfairness of the greater charge for a shorter distance is apparent, and yet when careful consideration is given to such instances and illustrations as have been cited to the committee it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that, while the principle that no greater charge should be made for a shorter than for a longer distance is just and right, exceptions to the general rule may sometimes be warranted, even in the case of individual roads. And when the effect of the proposed prohibition is considered with reference to the whole internal commerce of the United States, and especially with reference to the necessity of preserving the prevailing cheap rates for long-distance transportation, there is reason to fear that the result of rigidly enforcing the proposed regulation would be to stifle competition in numberless cases where it now exists and is to the general public interest, and perhaps to deprive the country of the benefits of the low through rates now and for years given to and from the tide water, without practical or appreciable advantage to intervening points.

The purpose to be accomplished by prohibiting greater charges for shorter than for longer hauls is to equalize the existing differences between through and local rates. It is intended for the protection of those most in need of protection, the shippers at interior non-competitive points, and to prevent corporate carriers from charging such shippers unreasonable rates in order to recoup the losses sustained in reckless rate wars and by carrying through freights at less than cost.

The accomplishment of the purpose aimed at is a "consummation most devoutly to be wished," and the necessity of remedying the discriminations complained of is apparent. The real question to be considered is, therefore, whether an absolute prohibition of a greater charge for a shorter than for a longer distance would accomplish the result desired by those who favor such legislation.

Mr. President, I think the committee would have been fully justified in saying that it is too plain to be made plainer by argument, that such a rule is susceptible of universal application, and would, under all circumstances, be a useful and fair one. The justice of the general principle seems now to be admitted on all sides. The extent and manner of its application seem to be the only question.

If the fourth section had stopped at the end of the provision prohibiting charging more for a shorter than a longer haul over the same road and in the same direction, leaving out the words, "from the same original point of departure," in lines 5 and 6, and then had left out the entire proviso following, the section would have accomplished the object intended to be provided for by the proposed amendment, and the object which ought to be provided for and without which any bill will fail to meet the widest field of necessity for the passage of a law regulating interstate commerce.

The section as it stands limits the provisions against charging more for a shorter than a longer haul to shipments from the same original point of departure. Why should this limitation be made? What justice is there in it?

Take, for instance, Chicago as the great starting-point from the West, in which all the trunk-line roads leading to the seaboard are in competition—this provision limiting its operations to the same original starting-point would mean, that if a car-load of grain, live stock, or any other product was shipped to the seaboard at a given rate, the rates on all other shipments of the same kind of freight from Chicago to the same points or to intermediate points should not be charged more than the through rate from Chicago to the seaboard, but as soon as you get out of Chicago the roads have arbitrary discretion to charge the whole country outside of Chicago to the seaboard any arbitrary rates they choose.

This would insure to Chicago and other great competitive shipping points cheap and uniform rates of transportation in all directions, but would deny the same advantages and protection to intermediate points and all other sections not blessed with large commerce and competing roads. Such a provision might aptly be termed "A bill to increase the wealth and population of commercial cities at the expense of the country at large," for it not only discriminates against shippers, who are generally the producers, at intermediate and non-competitive points, but it does more—it discriminates against sections of country, it discriminates against the thrift and enterprise of towns and the distribution of manufacturing interests, the value of real estate, and of the general interest and enterprise of the whole country outside of the large cities and competitive shipping points. It regulates arbitrarily the interstate commerce of the country, and usurps a function which the Constitution confides to Congress alone. It amounts to an abuse; and abuses will find a correction sooner or later, especially where great popular interests are involved.

A town or section of country may have manufacturing advantages of certain kinds that would enable it to manufacture to advantage in competition with larger places at the same rate of freight. But manufacturers and shippers at such points may be either forced into bankruptcy or compelled to remove their business to the cities or competitive railroad centers by being charged higher rates on short hauls than competitors in the same line of business are charged for longer hauls. It has the effect of driving population and business enterprise from the country and the towns to the cities and centers of railroad competition, and of creating for one section over another section commercial advantages which no power ought to be permitted to exercise.

In order to show the workings of the provision as it stands in the bill, let us start with a shipment from Chicago or Saint Louis and follow it through to the seaboard, and for the purpose of this illustration we will assume the average distance to be 800 miles and divide it into sections of 50 miles each.

A car-load of freight starts, billed through to the seaboard at $50. The provision limits the rate to all other shippers of the same kind of freight over the same road from that point to the same destination, or to intermediate points over the same road to the same rate, or in case of the shorter haul not to exceed the same charge; but after you get out 10 miles from the original point of departure the limitation is removed and shippers may be charged in the first 50 miles 20 per cent. more than was charged from Chicago or Saint Louis to any point in the same direction; and shippers in the next section of 50 miles may be charged 30 per cent. more, and so on for any succeeding section, there being no limitation as compared with the shipments from other points of departure. The right to charge is unlimited except by the capacity of the freight to bear the charges.

But let us assume that at the end of the sixth section, or 300 miles from the first point of departure, the car reaches another important shipping center where competition forces a recognition of the 300 miles shorter haul, and the rate from that point is $35 for the car-load, but as soon as you get out of that point on the next section of 50 miles the limitation is again removed and the conditions may favor charging for the sections covering the next 200 miles double the rate charged in any of the preceding sections. In other words, the provision extends only to shipments from the same points—and leaves all other points and sections open to the same palpable discriminations that now exist, for local rates to go up or down as circumstances and location permit. Competition fixes rates for cities and centers of trade; individual railroad lines fix it for the country and towns through which they pass.

Mr. President, we will now go back over the illustration to point out the practical features of the discriminations to which shippers so much object and so earnestly demand shall be corrected by legislation. The charge to the shippers on the first section of 50 miles after leaving the original starting-point is not governed by the rates for the longer haul, and may be charged $20, or even $30, more per car than was charged for the longer haul. They therefore see passing their doors car-loads of the same products from a greater distance going to the same markets at a less rate of freight; and this same feature of discrimination may and does continue with increased aggravation and injustice at various points as the distance increases from the starting-point and diminishes toward the markets, until in the States occupying the geographical position, like the one which I have the honor in part to represent, situated in the line of transit two-thirds of the distance nearer the Eastern market, is often charged considerably more for the same products for one-third or one-fourth the haul than was charged to others from the original point of departure in the far West.

But, Mr. President, the evils of this kind of discrimination complained of are not confined by any means to the long hauls from the West. The far greater proportion, I would say 80 per cent., originates along the lines of railroads from non-competitive points as compared with competitive points throughout the country in all directions, and the illustration drawn from the longer haul is applicable to all points and distances on every road to which legislation by Congress could apply. Take, for instance, competitive points along the Ohio River—where low rates prevail by reason of competition—and the non-competitive points 50 and 100, or even 200 miles nearer the market, the same products going in the same direction are often charged 50 per cent. more, and sometimes double the amount of the longer haul from the Ohio River or beyond it.

Mr. President, this is not theory, nor is it the statement of imaginary cases that might exist; it is the every-day experience. It is a notorious fact that men engaged in agricultural and stock-raising pursuits in West Virginia and other States near the Eastern markets, who ship their products from points one-half to three-fourths nearer the markets, will be met in the same markets with the same kind of products shipped two or three times the distance, coming by their own doors at greatly less rates, often as much as one-half less. And it sometimes happens that shippers living in these States ship their own products to market and at the same time purchase products of the same kind in Chicago and the West and ship to the same market at the same time at less freight than is paid for their own products almost at the market gates.

In support of this assertion I beg to read a letter, received only a few days ago from one of the most substantial, intelligent, and reputable farmers of the South Branch Valley, in my State. I do not give his name, for the reason that I have no authority to give it publicity, but the letter is only the repetition of complaints received by Senators and Representatives almost daily on this subject. The letter says:

> I believe you are opposed to the interstate-commerce bill. I believe the people of our State are almost unanimously in favor of it. I know of none who are opposed to it, except those who are interested in special rates and in railroads.

I will stop here to remark in this connection that I do not know how the writer could have imagined this to be my position unless he has been deceived by misrepresentations, or imagines that because I have some railroad interests in my own State I can not rise to the level of a disinterested conviction on this important subject. I have that conviction, and this is not the first time I have expressed it on this floor. But let that pass; that is not the point to which I wish to call the attention of Senators.

The letter goes on to say:

> Our people complain very much of discriminations; it costs us more to get our cattle to market (from the point named in West Virginia), often as much as double, as from farther west. I was in Philadelphia in December, with cattlemen from Ohio and farther west, who were paying about one-half the rate of freight I paid. I buy more or less cattle in Chicago every spring, and it costs me a great deal more to get my cattle home than to ship them to the seaboard. Our State can never prosper unless we can compete with the West in transportation. They get to market so much cheaper than we do. We would be better off if we were 500 miles farther west. I own one of the best farms in this part of the State, and am offering it for sale in order to go west, where I can get cheaper transportation, and many others are doing the same thing and leaving our State.

Now, Mr. President, why should we legislate to perpetuate this discrimination, that affects the great body of shippers all over the country, instead of providing for its relief? I challenge any satisfactory reason for it. If we are in earnest about passing a bill that will reach the greatest evils of discrimination let us meet the question fairly and squarely. If you limit the provisions "to the same original point of departure," instead of covering the most important principle in long and short hauls, it only adds to the evils of the discriminations complained of by practically sanctioning its most objectionable feature.

Such a bill discriminates in favor of discrimination, for it discriminates against whole sections of country, and would give to large cities the monopoly of nearly all kinds of business by reason of the guarantee that would be offerred for cheap and uniform transportation charges. This principle was most eloquently expressed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], although I believe he voted against the amendment then pending. I quote from the remarks of the Senator, page 438, second session of the Forty-eighth Congress:

> The people of this country can not be brought to an acceptance of the abnormal system of forced combination and centralization with which the transporting corporations have bound to their own real or supposed convenience the industries of the country. I am glad to feel assured that this is so; for I can not believe that the present tendency to drive the manufacturing industries and all who employ and are employed therein to a comparatively few localities will tend to conserve the best public interests, whether we regard them from the standpoints of moral, material, or political consideration, singly or combined. The system is repressive and unjust. A body-politic can no more thrive under a system which confines the vital forces represented by its employments, its business, its commerce to a few points than can a natural body whose life currents are obstructed and denied their normal action. A self-reliant man, whose independence and individuality assert themselves in his ways of life, is always a conquering force. A nation thrives by multiplication of such men; it weakens and dwarfs as their numbers diminish. The rule is not confined to individuals. It applies to communities as well as to men. A self-reliant, energetic, prosperous, contented community is a national force. Multiply this force, and the nation grows in strength, prosperity, contentment; and so long as these conditions exist its power will increase and its institutions endure.
> Mr. President, a diffusion of industries will multiply such communities as will give us the results I have indicated, and this diffusion will transpire whenever the transportation shackles shall have been stricken from the willing limbs of communities now impatient of the restraints which hold them to inaction. They want to move, but they can not. They witness the processes of forced centralization going on, and feel and know that the vast concentration of capital, and work, and workers in the ponderous cities gives back no augury of encouragement to us to let this system go on unchallenged. I do not mean by this that we should so legislate that cities shall cease to grow; but I do mean that the practices of the transporting corporations whereby abnormal growth is forced upon a few cities at the expense of the equal rights of other communities shall cease by voluntary action or be reformed by law, and in saying this I look beyond the field covered by the material interests of those other communities as they may be affected by a diffusion of industries throughout the country, and into that even more intricate one where the action of political forces tends to resolve the weal or woe of this Republic. Nor do I make the suggestion in any sense from the standpoint of partisan consideration, but from that better view which takes in the public good, the general welfare and stability of our institutions, regardless of the effect which may fall to any party organization or association of men.

The committee admit, within certain limitations and oft-occurring conditions, that the provision prohibiting charging more for a shorter than a longer haul, which includes the shorter haul, would be a useful and fair one.

Mr. President, there should be no limitations to these conditions. Railroad experts may, and do, advance plausible theories for retaining this unlimited control over shipments along the lines of their roads, but there can be no just and equitable reason for it. A railroad company may say that it can haul a loaded car twice the distance under certain conditions for the same amount that it would haul another car, similarly loaded, one-half the distance. That means that a loaded car can be hauled a given distance for nothing, but no railroad company can demonstrate that a loaded car can be hauled a given distance for less than nothing.

The amendment proposed does not provide that the charge shall be in proportion to the distance, or at a rate per mile; it simply requires that railroads shall not charge a greater sum for the same kind of freight for a shorter haul than it does for a longer haul, which includes the shorter. Shippers are willing that the railroads shall receive fair and remunerative rates; they do not complain so much of the rates as they do of the unfairness of discriminations that gives one section advantages over another section, one town over another town, and one set of manufacturers over other manufacturers; that makes lands in one locality worth more than in another locality less eligibly situated with reference to the markets. And they especially complain to see car-loads of the same kind of freight passing their doors from more distant points to the same markets at less cost than they pay for transporting the same class of freight to the same market a less distance.

Albert Fink, trunk-line commissioner, and perhaps the highest authority on railroad traffic in this country, says in his evidence before your committee, on page 91:

> The local charges can always be properly regulated when proper through tariffs are maintained; hence the first object should be to secure the maintenance of properly adjusted through tariffs that are reasonable to the public and to the railroads. This done there will be no difficulty in adjusting local tariffs and preventing unjust discrimination. It is a rule generally adopted by all railroads to properly adjust local tariffs to the through tariffs when the latter are reasonable and fairly remunerative. For example, the tariffs of the Pennsylvania Railroad are so arranged that no higher charge is made from any station east of Pittsburgh to Philadelphia than from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, nor from any station this side of Chicago than from Chicago. That is a rule generally adopted by all roads.
> Senator HARRIS. Never to charge more for a short than for a long distance?
> Mr. FINK. I do not say "never," because there are conditions under which this may be done without any injustice; but it is the general rule, in making tariffs, that whenever a proper through tariff is established, under which the railroads can live, they regulate all the local charges so as not to cause any unjust discrimination between the through and local rates; but when the railroads get into a fight, as some of them are at present, and when they charge 10 or 12 cents a hundred on grain from Chicago to New York, less than the cost of transportation, not because such low rates are a commercial necessity, but simply because the companies can not control the maintenance of reasonable rates on account of dissension among themselves, then the local rates can not be graded down to suit those through rates, and unjust discrimination between local and through rates is the unavoidable result.
> The CHAIRMAN. You say the local rates can not be graded down?
> Mr. FINK. They can be, of course; but the result would be that the roads would very soon have to stop running, because they would not make enough money to pay their operating expenses; and it is in this way that the great difficulty arises, which has given just cause to much complaint, that in times of war between the railroads, when proper, well-regulated tariffs are not maintained, the local interests suffer, and unjust discrimination exists. The remedy, however, is not to put down the local rates, but to put up the through rates to a proper basis which would be just and reasonable both to the public and the railroads.
> The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean by the Government?
> Mr. FINK. That is the question. There can be no doubt that there must be some control exercised over the railroad tariffs that will prevent unjust discrimination. If the railroads can not govern themselves, then I think it is proper that the Government should step in and give aid to the railroads. In that case the question would be whether the Government can give any aid at all, and what that aid should be.

It will be observed that Mr. Fink, who speaks with as much knowledge and authority from a railroad standpoint as any man in this country, concedes the justice of the long and short haul principle, but assumes that through rates must control the local rates; and as the railroads, by reason of competition, rate-cutting, and rate wars, can not control the through rates, that the local rates must not be controlled. That is to say, that railroad managers must be allowed to cut each other's throats on long hauls from competing points and make up the deficiency on the balance of the country by higher rates on shorter hauls.

Mr. President, is it not plain that if Mr. Fink will reverse his proposition and give stability and something like uniformity to local rates he will solve the problem of uniformity and stability to through rates? For if railroads are prohibited from charging more for a short than for a longer haul, which includes the shorter haul, and they know that competition and rate-cutting at distant points means rate-cutting all through to the end of the line in the same direction, would the roads not be forced in self-preservation to maintain uniform and fair through rates in order to maintain proportionate local rates? And why should not the local rates be made to govern the through rates to the extent that the charge for a short haul should not exceed the charge for the longer haul? The more especially so since the intermediate points supply so much the larger proportion of the freight.

All railroads must depend chiefly for support on the traffic originating along the lines of their roads, and for that reason ought to encourage and build up their local business. This is a well-recognized fact. Then why should this great preponderance of local traffic be subordinated to the caprices of a comparatively small amount of traffic from through competitive points?

Take, for instance, the tonnage over the Pennsylvania Railroad on its main line east of Pittsburgh, and the statistics for the past four years show that a fraction over 90 per cent. originated on its line, and only about 10 per cent. of what is called through freight originated and came to it from lines west of Pittsburgh. And what is true of the Pennsylvania Railroad is true to a greater or less extent of all other railroads.

This statement differs greatly from the general impression in regard to the extent and volume of what is called through freights, and I call the attention of Senators to it; that 90 per cent. of the freight traffic passing over the Pennsylvania Railroad east of Pittsburgh originates on its line, and that only 10 per cent. comes from west of Pittsburgh—the proportion may vary on other roads. And yet this small percentage of through freight is the subject of nearly all the railroad wars and rate-cuttings that disturb the transportation of the country. Is it not therefore fair, Mr. President, to shippers, and good policy on the part of the railroads, that the 90 per cent. of local freights originating along the line of the road should, within certain limits, govern the rates on the 10 per cent. of through business?

Mr. Fink says that the tariffs on the Pennsylvania Railroad are so arranged that no higher charge is made from any station east of Pittsburgh to Philadelphia than is charged from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, nor from any station this side of Chicago than from Chicago, and that this is the rule generally adopted by all railroads.

Now, that is just what is asked to be fixed by the proposed amendment, and it is precisely what is demanded by the great body of shippers of the country. It embodies a principle of fairness to shippers and security to railroads that is beginning to be recognized by nearly all railroad men, and I believe that all well-managed railroads would be ready to adopt and be controlled by this principle if, as Mr. Fink says, they could control themselves; but as it is conceded they can not control themselves Congress ought, in passing an interstate-commerce bill, to interpose and assert and maintain the principle for shippers and railroads alike.

Mr. President, this is no new position with me. I advocated the same principle in the Forty-eighth Congress when an amendment similar to the one now proposed only received 11 votes in this body. I quote from my speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 886 and 887:

> In my judgment, many of the evils complained of against the railroads are the result of unwise and undue competition between the roads which forces them to do things which are unnatural and unhealthy in a business point of view, and I believe that careful and progressive legislation will result in great advantage to the railroads as well as to the people by protecting the roads from the necessities of their own errors, for in nine cases out of ten the unwise action of one road in making undue discrimination forces all the other competing roads not only to do the same thing and to adopt for the time being the same policy, but even at times to go to a further extreme in the same direction.
> It is now a well-established principle in railroading that the movement of carloads of freight costs the railroad so much per ton per mile on the average. This amount is ascertained and known by each road with almost mathematical exactness. We may assume, if you please, for illustration, that this cost is at the average rate of 1 cent per ton per mile for all the freight hauled over the whole line of road, and it is equally well known that long hauls can be made at somewhat less cost in proportion than short hauls. It is, therefore, a fundamental principle in railroading that the average rates of tonnage per mile must be kept up to a point necessary to yield the road a fair profit on its capital from its gross business. Now, when a road takes its through freight from competitive points on a long haul at less than it can afford to do the business per mile and make a profit, or at less than it can afford to do the business and pay actual expenses, it must make up the deficiency on its average business from non-competitive points between the starting place and the market to be reached, and the lower it is forced to take through freight the higher it must charge on its local freight.
> This is the result of competition forced upon railroads by themselves rather than their voluntary action. For it is fair to presume that railroads as a matter of business would not of choice discriminate unjustly between shippers, but would equalize rates to a reasonable extent to produce the average earnings per mile required if they could follow out their own judgment of what would be equitable and fair and their own inclinations to do it.

And again:

> There can be no good reason assigned to justify railroads in making these discriminations, and I do not think they do make them from choice, but from necessity, to bring up their average earnings. There can be no more reason for a railroad charging more for half the labor than for twice the amount of labor than there would be for any other interest governed by the rules affected by machinery and labor, or than there would be for charging more for making one plow than for making two plows, or for a cart to charge more for carrying a load half a mile than it would for a mile over the same road; or for a hod-carrier to charge more to carry brick to the first story of a house than he would to carry the same brick to the second story over the same ladder by which he reached the first story. The cost of transportation to a railroad is measured by the wear and tear of the road and equipment, and the expenses per mile for fuel and labor in moving the train; and there is no theory that I have ever seen advanced that satisfies my mind that these physical conditions are varied to any great extent per mile in proportion to the distance.

It may be urged by Senators from the Western States that this amendment will tend to increase the through rates from Chicago, Saint Louis, and other large Western competitive points. I admit that on its face it will have this tendency, but it will have the counterbalancing effect in reducing the rates to shippers in the same States outside of the large cities. Under the operation of the amendment they will be relieved of burdens now borne on shipments into these centers from the interior, and so the principle will in the end adjust itself without detriment to the consumers or unjust influences on the large commercial centers. I have no complaint to make of the cheap rates given to the Western cities. I have no objection to that. What I want is that the nearer shipper shall not be charged more than the more distant shipper, and to that extent be made to assume and bear his burdens. But why should shippers from the far West, cultivating cheaper and more productive lands, ask to receive cheaper transportation for the same kind of products than is given to persons nearer the market, cultivating less productive and more expensive lands?

Why should the shipper of the same kind of products in the States of Indiana, Ohio, Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and other States similarly situated geographically be discriminated against and compelled to pay more than is charged from Chicago or Saint Louis? I think it is too plain for argument that the true principle is, that the nearer shippers should not be charged more than the shipper at a greater distance under any circumstances or under any conditions.

Mr. President, I have directed my remarks mainly to that clause in the section limiting its provisions to the same original point of departure, because that limitation embraces by far the widest range of exceptions in the application of the long and short haul principle. Its application, embracing all sections of the country, gives it almost universal application, and for that reason is of much greater importance than the provision extending discretionary power to vary the rule where there are competing water ways. This only affects comparatively few localities, but that provision, in my judgment, is also very objectionable, for it discriminates against water transportation by allowing the railroads to compete against such transportation at ruinous rates in order to take the freight that naturally belongs to such modes of transportation.

If a railroad can not afford to take freight from competitive points, that might otherwise go by water transportation, at rates that justify the same roads in taking freights of the same kind from nearer points, then the water routes should be allowed to carry it without legislative interference against their interests. To make this exception would in some cases interfere with equality and justice as between railroads. Thus New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk are competitive points for exportation; the railroads leading to all these cities are in competition at the same points in many sections where limited water transportation exists.

The railroads leading to one of these exporting cities may have water competition, while the roads leading to another export city may not have water competition. The effect of this proviso would be either to allow railroads to compete upon an unequal basis to seaboard cities by reason of one point having competing water transportation while another point did not have it, or else, by conceding the competitive rates governed by water transportation to all the roads leading to the seaboard, it would destroy the long and short haul principles at intermediate points on all the roads.

The proportion of the amount of freight carried by water is fast being diminished, and steel rails and other improvements in operating railroads tending to cheapen transportation, added to the certainty of quicker time and diminished risk, is enabling railroads to do the general business cheaper than the water ways. Railroads will in time become almost the sole carriers, but there are still large interests and investments in the equipments for water transportation, and the water ways still serve a most useful purpose in commerce. The speed of its destruction and disuse should not be hastened faster than fair, legitimate competition produces it. Therefore, whenever it will not pay railroads to take any kind of freight at rates that water ways can afford to take it, then the water ways should take it if the shipper prefers it. Railroads are now being built along the chief water courses, because it has been demonstrated that they can do the business cheaper than it can be done by water. Commerce should be left to follow its natural channels, and the railroads and water ways should be left to compete without discrimination.

In framing a general law for the benefit of the whole people of this country to regulate its vast carrying interests, is it not better to make the rule uniform and of general application, in which the interests of the vast body of the whole people are to be affected, rather than to make exceptions that apply only to isolated cases, and which exceptions may affect so materially the purposes of the bill?

In order to get at the exceptions it becomes necessary to delegate to the commission appointed under the provisions of the bill a dangerous discretion, which virtually places in their hands the essence of the whole question of discriminations intended to be remedied by the bill. It will also impair the usefulness and high reputation which the commission ought to possess for disinterested fairness and subject it to suspicions and imputations; for every exception the commission may make must be in the interests of the railroads, and it will subject it to embarrassing criticisms, from which it ought to be exempt.

Mr. President, I wish it understood that I have no war to make upon railroads or corporations within the proper limit of their usefulness. I only aim at fair and just regulations, such as will correct the unwisdom of their own acts and produce approximate stability and fairness in rates to their patrons. I know there are in many communities men whose hobby it is to denounce railroads, men who are neither laborers, producers, nor shippers themselves, and who never aided with encouragement or contributed by their means to the employment of labor, the building of railroads, or the development of any other useful public enterprise; men who do not create employment or "make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before."

If the development of the country in which they live had depended upon their exertions we would have had little interstate commerce to regulate, and we and our children perhaps for generations to come would have found our way from our forest homes by means familiar to the pioneers. In the eyes of such men, the man who invests his means or gives his energies to public enterprises is the subject of suspicion, denunciation, and abuse.

Mr. President, I have no sympathy with this class of agitators. They agitate, not because they have ever felt or known the effects of discriminations or the oppression of corporations, but agitate and denounce because it is their political stock in trade—a capital that costs nothing, an investment which if it pays is all clear gain to them, and leaves the development and thrift of the country to take care of itself or be taken care of by those who are willing to labor for it and be advertised as enemies to the public good.

Our railroads have been of untold benefit. They have been the means of opening up and developing this country as no other country has ever been developed in the same space of time before. They are "the arteries through which flows the life-blood of the world's commerce." They are the means of civilization and of progress in all the material aims and purposes of life. They have become so necessary to the development of every section of country, that emigration and capital will not go beyond the lines of transportation, and in the very nature of things all enterprises of magnitude, whether of railroad, mining, or manufacturing interests, must be built up and operated by the aggregation of capital in the form of corporations.

This capital, except in rare instances, can not be obtained in the communities to be benefited most by their construction. It is therefore not only unwise but unjust to foster the impression that such corporations are public enemies, to be denounced and legislated against as such.

This country has more capital invested in railroads than the aggregate of all other investments, and these securities are owned throughout the country indiscriminately, and they have precisely as much right to protection and no more than any other class of property that exists.

There is no community without the facilities of railroad transportation that does not hail with satisfaction the prospect of obtaining it, with all its accompanying advantages and conveniences. Without transportation manufacturing can not exist, mines can not be operated, forests can not be turned to value, labor is without demand and forced to seek employment where thrift and enterprise follow in the wake of transportation and commerce. We feel this in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, a State which lacks only railroad facilities to penetrate and develop its mines of hidden wealth and carry off its forests of valuable timber to make it one of the foremost States of the Union in wealth, prosperity, and increasing population. For these reasons I would ask no unjust or oppressive legislation to retard developments or imperil the capital already invested. I would treat all such corporations with the same fairness I would treat individuals, but I would require from them equal fairness to their patrons.

I would invite capital and enterprise and labor with the hospitality of friendship to come and make their homes with us, and would assure them fair and generous protection instead of proclaiming them enemies seeking to intrude unbidden and unwelcome into our territory. And, Mr. President, whatever may be said or done by the few who may be prompted by motives of their own, political or otherwise, I am sure that in the statement of this spirit of broad-minded and liberal fairness I represent the general sentiment on this subject which characterizes the great body of the good people of my own State and of the country at large.

This spirit is just to all—it is this spirit which has marked and made the progress of mankind. It will continue to promote the development of the country at large, and no State in all classes of its citizenship, with fair adjustment of the relations of labor and capital, will profit more largely by it than my own.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1487) to establish two additional land districts in the State of Nebraska.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1394) to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4007) to admit free of duty a certain set of altars for the Catholic church of St. John the Evangelist, in the parish of La Fayette, Louisiana, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CALL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Silvia Wilford be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Perry G. Wall and the executors of O. B. Hart, deceased, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Caroline M. Seton and Mary Jeannette Sibbald be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Matthew Smith be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Laura Prine be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Herman Ruge be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Julia A. Ross be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Ann Leddy be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Arvah Hopkins be taken from the file and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Cyprian T. Jenkins be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of James Filor, William Curry, and William Pinckney be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Jane L. Donelly be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, there being no adverse report.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Francis Denmead be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, there being no adverse report.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce; pending which the Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday next, the 19th instant.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate the 16th day of April, 1886.

POSTMASTERS.

Mrs. Virginia Campbell Thompson, to be postmaster at Louisville, Jefferson County, Kentucky, whose commission expired March 31, 1886.

John C. Riley, to be postmaster at Cincinnati, Hamilton County, Ohio, vice S. A. Whitfield, commission expired.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate, April 14, 1886.

INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTORS.

William T. Bishop, of Ohio, to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of Ohio.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the nomination of William

T. Bishop, of Ohio, to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of Ohio, in place of Clark B. Montgomery, suspended, beg leave to report as follows:

It appears, from all the information that the committee can obtain under the recent order of the President, that the former incumbent of the office, Col. Clark B. Montgomery, was an excellent officer, faithfully discharged his duties in all respects, has maintained his office in the front rank, and that he has been suspended without any charge or complaint reflecting upon his official or moral character or conduct. This information is derived from the uncontradicted testimony of those who know him best, and from his official record in the Treasury Department. It is not in the least impaired by the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, hereto annexed, which, fairly construed, fully vouches for Colonel Montgomery's official and moral character and conduct, covered under some ambiguous phrases, which were no doubt intended to save the President from the charge of insincerity in his official declaration in suspending so excellent an officer. It fairly appears that he was suspended for political reasons, and because he was a Republican, and that Mr. Bishop was appointed because he was a Democrat, and, as such, would, in the language of the Secretary, "better promote the policy of the present administration."

In this aspect of the case, and in view of the manly declaration of Colonel Montgomery that he has settled up his accounts, has the statement of the Department that they are correct and are closed, and has no desire to be restored to the office, and does not contend against the appointment of his successor, and your committee being satisfied, from other information; that Mr. Bishop is a man of good character and probably able to discharge the duties of the office, do recommend his confirmation.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 3, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of Clark B. Montgomery, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of Ohio, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto, I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions. But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your comunication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

James W. Newman, of Ohio, to be collector of internal revenue for the eleventh district of Ohio.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the nomination of James W. Newman, of Ohio, to be collector of internal revenue for the eleventh district of Ohio, in place of Marcus Boggs, suspended, beg leave to report as follows:

It appears, from all the information that the committee can obtain under the recent order of the President, that the former incumbent of the office, Maj. Marcus Boggs, was an excellent officer, faithfully discharged his duty in all respects, had an honorable record as an officer of the Union Army in the late war, has maintained his office in the front rank, and that he has been suspended without any charge or complaint reflecting upon his official or moral character or conduct. This information is derived from the uncontradicted testimony of those who know him best, and his official record and conduct. It is not in the least impaired by the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, hereto annexed, which, fairly construed, fully vouches for Major Boggs's official and moral character and conduct, covered under some ambiguous phrases, which were no doubt intended to save the President from the charge of insincerity in his official declarations in suspending so excellent an officer. It fairly appears that he was suspended for political reasons, and because he was a Republican, and that Mr. Newman was appointed because he was a Democrat, and, as such, would, in the language of the Secretary, "better promote the policy of the present administration."

In this aspect of this case, and in view of the manly declaration of Major Boggs that he has settled up his accounts, has the statement of the Department that they are correct and are closed, and has no desire to be restored to the office, and does not contend against the appointment of his successor, and your committee being satisfied, from other information, that Mr. Newman is a man of good character and probably able to discharge the duties of the office, do recommend his confirmation.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 3, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of Marcus Boggs, late collector of internal revenue for the eleventh district of Ohio, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions. Respectfully yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

Christian J. Knecht, of Ohio, to be collector of internal revenue for the sixth district of Ohio.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the nomination of Christian J. Knecht, of Ohio, to be collecter of internal revenue for the sixth district of Ohio, in place of George P. Dunham, suspended, beg leave to report as follows:

It appears from all the information the committee can obtain under the recent order of the President that the former incumbent of the office, Col. George P. Dunham, was an excellent officer, faithfully discharged his duties in all respects, had an honorable record as an officer of the Union Army in the late war, has maintained his office in the front rank, and that he has been suspended without any charge or complaint reflecting upon his official or moral character or conduct. This information is derived from the uncontradicted testimony of those who know him best, and his official record and conduct. It is not in the least impaired by the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury hereto annexed, which, fairly construed, fully vouches for Colonel Dunham's official and moral character and conduct, covered under some ambiguous phrases, which were no doubt intended to save the President from the charge of insincerity in his official declarations in suspending so excellent an officer. It fairly appears that he was suspended for political reasons, and because he was a Republican, and that Mr. Knecht was appointed because he was a Democrat, and as such would, in the language of the Secretary, "better promote the policy of the present administration."

In this aspect of this case, and in view of the manly declaration of Colonel Dunham that he has settled up his accounts, has the statement of the Department that they are correct and are closed, and has no desire to be restored to the office, and does not contend against the appointment of his successor, and your committee being satisfied, from other information, that Mr. Knecht is a man of good character and probably able to discharge the duties of the office, do recommend his confirmation.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

Frederick Gerker, of Pennsylvania, to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD.

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 869) of Frederick Gerker, of Pennsylvania, to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania, in place of William J. Pollock, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. Gerker is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of William J. Pollock, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 16, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of William J. Pollock, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions.

But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

A resolution, as follows, was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Finance, April 6, 1886, in relation to this and all similar letters to the foregoing:

Resolved, That the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance, dated March 16, 1886, or subsequently, in relation to the suspension of collectors of internal revenue, should be received and held as honest declarations made in good faith that there are no charges or papers on file in the Department reflecting in any manner against their moral or official conduct or character."

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Gerker.

Asa Ellis, of California, to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of California.

Thomas H. Simms, of Arkansas, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Arkansas.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 845) of Thomas H. Simms, of Arkansas, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Arkansas, in place of Henry M. Cooper, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr. Simms is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Henry M. Cooper, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1886.

POSTMASTER AT KEOKUK.

Patrick Gibbons, to be postmaster at Keokuk, in the county of Lee and State of Iowa.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to which was referred the nomination of Patrick Gibbons to be postmaster at Keokuk, Iowa, vice S. M. Clark, suspended, reports:

That the suspension of Mr. Clark was made on purely political grounds. The entire files of the Post-Office Department relative to the case were communicated to the committee by the Postmaster-General in response to its request for the same. There is nothing in the papers on file that tends in the slightest degree to injuriously affect the character, reputation, or integrity of Mr. Clark either as an officer or as a man. Moreover, Mr. Clark does not desire to retain the office or to obstruct Mr. Gibbons's confirmation. On the contrary, he has addressed a letter to a member of the committee, in which he says:

"As Mr. HALL, Representative in Congress from the district in which the office is located, seems to have asked for Mr. Gibbons's appointment on purely political grounds, which I deem admissible, and not upon grounds in any way prejudicial to me, and as Mr. Gibbons may be injured in a personal and business way by present incertitude, I take the liberty to ask you at your earliest convenience to call up his case and have him confirmed."

The committee thereupon report the case to the Senate with a recommendation that Patrick Gibbons be confirmed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 16, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PASSED ASSISTANT PAYMASTER FRANCIS J. PAINTER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting copies of proceedings in that Department relative to the retirement from active service of Passed Assistant Paymaster Francis J. Painter; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY IN CHICAGO.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. In accordance with the consent obtained yesterday I now call up for consideration the bill (S. 1394) to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the bill be read before the twenty minutes allowed for debate begin. According to the understanding of yesterday, I believe it was intended there should be twenty minutes for debate exclusive of the time occupied in the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That seems to have been the understanding yesterday morning.

Mr. HOLMAN. So that there will be twenty minutes for debate after the bill is read.

The SPEAKER. Is the reading of the bill demanded?

Mr. HITT. Will it be in order to offer amendments when the bill comes up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. It will be unless the previous question should be ordered.

Mr. HITT. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FELTON. Has unanimous consent been given for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. Consent was given yesterday morning that the bill be taken up to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HOLMAN. There will be twenty minutes for debate after the bill is read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill has once been read to the House. Is the reading again demanded?

Mr. HAMMOND. It had better be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the Chicago and Great Western Railroad Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of the State of Illinois, is constructing its railroad within the city of Chicago, and possesses, under its charter and under the ordinances of said city, a franchise to construct, maintain, and operate its railroad to Harrison street, in said city, for which purpose it has acquired, and is acquiring, by purchase and otherwise, the real estate lying between Taylor street and said Harrison street, and west of Fifth avenue; and

Whereas the United States owns the south half of block 87, in school section addition to Chicago, which is in the center of the property so acquired and being acquired by said railroad company for terminal facilities, and is vacant, and is indispensable to said company in exercising said franchise and affording to the public the terminal facilities for which said company has so purchased the property as aforesaid: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to name, within ten days after the passage of this act, a commission, to consist of three persons, officers of the United States, whose duty it shall be to ascertain and report to said Secretary, within twenty days after their appointment, the cash market value of the lot above mentioned in the city of Chicago; and the said Secretary is hereby authorized and empowered to sell and convey the said lot to the said Chicago and Great Western Railroad Company, at such price, not less in any event than the value thereof as appraised and reported by said commission, as he and said railroad company shall agree upon; the said price, when agreed upon, to be paid in cash: Provided, however, That if said Secretary and said railroad company shall be unable to agree upon the price to be paid for said property, the same shall be finally fixed by a board of three commissioners to be appointed as follows: One, upon the application of the railroad company, on notice to the district attorney of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, by the district judge of the United States in and for said district; another to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the two thus chosen to select a third, who shall be competent and disinterested. The said board thus constituted, or a majority thereof, shall fix the price (not to be less, however, than the first appraisal thereof hereinbefore provided for) at which the same shall be sold to said company, and upon payment to the Secretary of the Treasury of said price the title to said property shall vest in said company, its successors and assigns. If the purchase-price of said land, as agreed upon or finally fixed as hereinbefore provided, is not paid within ten days after the same shall have been so agreed upon or fixed as aforesaid, this act shall be null and void.

SEC. 2. That all costs incurred under the provisions hereof in appraising said property, or ascertaining the price to be paid therefor, shall be added to the said price as agreed upon, or as the same may be finally fixed hereunder, and paid by said railroad company.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall invest the purchase-money of said lot so paid to him, or so much thereof as may be necessary therefor, in a suitable lot within the corporate limits of the city of Chicago, and shall cause to be erected upon said lot a building for Government uses, with the appropriation made by and in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Chicago, Ill.," approved March 3, 1885.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In section 1, strike out the words "officers of the United States."

In section 1, between the words "three" and "persons," insert the word "disinterested."

Amend by inserting after the word "assigns," in the first section, the following:

"Upon the following express conditions, that all non-competing railroads not now having right of way into Chicago, desiring to use the tracks, switches, depots, and terminal facilities of said Chicago and Great Western Railroad, shall be by said company or its assigns permitted to do so, to the extent of the capacity of said company to furnish railroad terminal facilities, upon fair and equitable terms and regulations; and in the event the companies interested can not agree upon such terms and regulations, then the same shall be fixed and determined by three disinterested persons, one of whom shall be selected by said Chicago and Great Western Railroad Company, one by such other company as may desire to use said tracks, switches, and terminal facilities, and the third by the two persons so selected."

Strike out section 3, and insert the following section in its stead:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall invest the purchase-money of the said lot received by him, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in the purchase or acquisition by condemnation of a site, and in the erection thereon of a suitable and commodious warehouse, for the use of the United States local appraiser of customs, and other Government uses in the city of Chicago. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the purchase-money received by the Secretary of the Treasury for the lot mentioned in the first section of this act; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said purchase-money received by the Secretary of the Treasury under this act for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Illinois shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

"And the act entitled 'An act for the erection of a public building at Chicago, Ill.,' approved March 3, 1885, is hereby repealed."

Mr. WORTHINGTON. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I desire to offer, with the consent of the committee, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. It can be read now for information; the first question will be upon the amendments reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "however," in line 15, down to and including the word "company," in line 28, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to direct said Secretary to make said sale, unless he shall deem the price fixed by the commission or agreed to be paid by said railroad company to be a fair and reasonable price and that the interests of the Government will not suffer by said sale."

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The object of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, as every gentleman can see by a moment's examination, is to take from the bill its mandatory character and leave it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury whether or not to make the sale after the appraisement shall have been made by the three appraisers to be appointed by him. A single remark as to the bill. It has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and is unanimously reported by them with the amendments, because they believe that the public interests will be materially promoted by the passage of the bill. A railroad company, having already completed 600 miles of railroad, is seeking to gain an entrance into the city of Chicago, having purchased the right of way at a cost, I am informed, of nearly $3,000,000. This piece of land, belonging to the Government, is the only piece of land now blocking that right of way. It can not be condemned, because it is Government property. It is of no peculiar value to the Government any more than any other lot similarly situated; and the railway company is perfectly willing to pay every cent that any disinterested men may say the property is worth. I think every possible guard has been thrown about the bill in order to protect the interests of the Government.

Mr. MILLS. I notice that by the provisions of the bill the proceeds of the sale of this land are to go to the construction of a public building in the city of Chicago. Will this be in addition to the appropriation already made?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. No, sir. I will explain that. The bill repeals the act of the last Congress, which appropriated $50,000 for building an appraisers' warehouse, and turns that money back into the Treasury; but it is believed that from the proceeds of the sale proposed by this bill sufficient money will be obtained to purchase a lot suitable for an appraisers' warehouse and to erect that building. This, I believe, is the whole proposition of the bill.

Mr. FELTON. Does this bill make that appropriation?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It authorizes the use of the proceeds of this lot, when sold, for the purchase of another lot and the erection of a building; but it repeals the act of the last Congress, and turns the $50,000 then appropriated back into the Treasury.

If no further debate is desired I will ask the previous question upon the bill and amendments, reserving the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust this bill will receive at least a few moments' careful attention. The Government owns part of a block in the city of Chicago, known, I believe, as the Bridewell lot. Two years ago we made an appropriation of $50,000 to erect an appraisers' warehouse upon that lot. For some reason or other the erection of that warehouse has not commenced; and now this bill is brought forward proposing to sell this lot to a railroad corporation and to buy ground elsewhere in the city of Chicago upon which to erect the appraisers' warehouse.

The history of the ownership of this property by the Government indicates the importance of some care in disposing of public property where other property is to be purchased in its stead. In 1873 we acquired this Bridewell property from the city of Chicago by an even exchange. We transferred to that city certain real estate we owned in that city for this Bridewell lot—an even transaction, property for property, an even exchange.

It was supposed at that time the transaction was favorable or at least fair to the Government. It now appears the property we transferred to the city of Chicago is worth from $600,000 to $650,000, while this property we acquired in lieu of it is said now to be worth only $125,000. In this single transaction affecting this real estate the Government would seem to be a loser, if that statement is correct, by over half a million of dollars.

Now it is proposed that the Government dispose of that Bridewell property with a view of adding to the convenience of the commerce of that city and at the same time purchasing other property in that city to be applied to the use for which the property sold was intended to be applied.

I will state briefly the objection I have to this measure. I have not felt justified, inasmuch as the gentlemen representing the State of Illinois, and especially the gentlemen representing the city of Chicago, believe that this is a proper measure, to interpose further objection to its consideration; and yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] knows very well I do not favor the passage of this bill, even as proposed to be amended. I understood from him that he is willing to go a step further and throw the entire responsibility of the ascertainment of the value of this property upon the Secretary of the Treasury, the appraisers to be appointed by him. I wish to avoid any divided responsibility. I wish the whole responsibility to remain with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. He alone is to be responsible for the appointment.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is in the appointment of these three appraisers who are to ascertain the value of this property?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Yes; it leaves with him the entire responsibility of that matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. It leaves with the Secretary of the Treasury the responsibility as to the mode of ascertaining the value and whether or not he will dispose of this property. In that view I admit the bill is a safer measure than as originally proposed.

But, Mr. Speaker, the fact can not be overlooked that it is not in the interest of the Government to sell property where other property must be purchased for the same purpose to which the property to be sold was designed to be applied. The Government always sells at a low price and buys at a high one.

It is said in a statement which has come to me from the city of Chicago that the corporation to which this property is to be sold has not the right of way in the county of Cook, in which the city of Chicago is situated. That the attorney representing the board of county commissioners, at the instance of that board, has instituted proceedings in the proper court in the city of Chicago to enjoin that corporation from entering that county and crossing its roads and public highways as not being a railroad corporation vested with such rights. As to that I know nothing except from the statement made, but of which I wish the House to be informed.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If that be true, then they will not want this land.

Mr. HOLMAN. That does not follow. The statement I refer to is clipped from the Chicago Times of the 3d of April. The statement made is this: that the corporation acquiring this property is to furnish terminal facilities, not to one particular corporation, but for the purpose of leasing out its property to other corporations; a speculative measure that a number of corporations are interested in. Yet that fact of itself does not necessarily diminish the force of the suggestion that the Government should not interpose its authority and its property against a public improvement. It must be admitted that the Government ought not to occupy the position of interposing unnecessarily between a proper public improvement in its ownership and control of property.

But I have thought it necessary to submit these matters to the consideration of the House, so the whole facts, so far as I am informed of them, may be known to the House.

Our experience has been not only in the city of Chicago, in the instance I have mentioned, but in New York and elsewhere, that we have generally sold property at a low price where we have sold it, and purchased at an exorbitantly high price where we have purchased it. It seems to me, therefore, the fair mode of procedure in this matter would be to leave the Secretary of the Treasury in condition to say to this corporation, "You furnish a given body of land as valuable as this and equally adapted as this for the purpose of the Government and the Government will make an exchange with you."

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. He can do that now.

Mr. HOLMAN. In that way the Government might possibly acquire property adapted to its purposes of equal value with the property in question and no loss would be sustained.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I yield now one minute, or two, if he wishes it, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I am too far away from Chicago——

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to have it read for information, so that he can consider that also in the course of his remarks?

Mr. MORRISON. Let the proposed amendment be read.

Mr. HITT. I move to amend by striking out——

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to my colleague [Mr. HITT] that his amendment may be read for information—not to be offered now. Neither do I propose to discuss it. I have only a minute for reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HITT. I will offer the amendment hereafter.

Mr. MORRISON. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am too far away from Chicago when at home to know much, personally, of the merits of this question; but after very diligent inquiry into the facts I am convinced that there is so much merit in the proposition as to justify us in passing this bill. The Illinois members representing the city of Chicago all favor the bill. The statements of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], as I believe and from what I do know of the matter, are misleading, if not unfair. He says, truly maybe, the State exchanged property with the Government heretofore, and then estimated equal in value to this property, and that this property so taken in exchange is now estimated to be worth $125,000 only, while the other given in exchange to the State has advanced in value to $600,000. In that I think the gentleman was not quite fair. I think he should have stated further that this lot now in question is a sort of dumping-ground for the city.

Mr. LAWLER. That is just what it is.

Mr. MORRISON. And the property which the city of Chicago got in exchange for it has been improved by the expenditure of vast sums of money, expended on public or costly and splendid buildings on the property itself and the adjacent property. In these splendid structures and improvements are to be found the causes for increased value of the grounds on which they are built, as well as adjacent grounds. No doubt a like expenditure on or in the immediate vicinity of this Bridewell lot would raise its present value, and it, too, would be worth $600,000.

If the improvements had been made and the money expended upon the property we now offer to sell, it would have increased in value in the same proportion as that we exchanged for it. These are the facts as stated to me by the Chicago members here, as well as by other gentlemen from Chicago who have no personal interest involved.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I now ask the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the time fixed for the general debate by the House has not yet expired; the gentleman from Indiana has four minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the statement of my friend from Illinois I will say that my understanding is different from his. My understanding is that this property, which was transferred to the city of Chicago by the United States in equal exchange for the property now under consideration, bears a ground-rent upon a valuation of $600,000, so that the amount expended for improvements and buildings upon it is not taken into account in estimating its value on that statement. I repeat, the ground-rent is based upon an actual valuation of the real estate at $600,000. If so, the loss to the Government in that transaction is apparent.

But I only mention this to show the importance of caution when it is proposed that the Government shall dispose of real estate which it needs, and when it will be called upon to purchase other property for the same purposes in the same locality. In such case the Government will most certainly be the losing party.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If it be true that the Government made a bad trade in swapping some other property for this, I would like to ask if that is any reason why the Government should not dispose of this property at a fair price?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a very fair question, and my answer is, inasmuch as experience has taught us that usually governments sell at a low price and buy at a high price, we ought to guard carefully such transactions, and not sell except where public interests really require it. Three or four just such transactions have taken place within the last few years in the city of New York alone; and in view of the facts that these transactions are never favorable to the Government, I submit that Congress can not overlook the probable result of this transaction.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Is not the Government well guarded in this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I admit that it is so far as the direct responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury is concerned, as proposed to be amended.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And if it is not guarded, then the amendment which the gentleman in charge of the bill has offered would seem to be a sufficient protection.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Can you state whether the Representatives of the people in this House are in favor of this bill; those representing the people of Chicago?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand they are.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I only wanted to get the admission of that fact from the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that they are in favor of the bill, but they are not alone responsible for our legislation; but that is a reason I did not feel justified to further interpose objection to at least a consideration of the bill by the House. But I wish to see the rights of the Government properly protected and guarded in whatever may be determined upon in connection with the disposition of this property, as you are not proposing to sell for the benefit of the Government—for the Government does not desire to sell—but for the benefit of other parties.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to submit an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are amendments to this bill already proposed by the committee, and one proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON]; so that other amendments would not now be in order, except that they may be read by consent of the House for information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman will be read.

The SPEAKER. It can be read for information.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I can not consent to the amendment which I understand the gentleman proposes to offer. It is a matter that was considered fully, and was rejected by the committee in its present shape.

Mr. HITT. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1, of the second amendment of the committee, strike out the words "non-competing."

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield the balance of my time, if I have any, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] to explain his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has only half a minute.

Mr. HITT. The amendment would permit any road hereafter built by the people into Chicago to enter upon fair and equitable terms into this depot, and to do it under such conditions and restrictions as would work no injustice to the road that now proposes to enter there. It would save the people, who ultimately pay all that goes to build and run the railroad, the paying of $10,000,000 for a new entry into Chicago. It would do in this case exactly what has been done by five competing roads in another part of the city of Chicago, where they all harmoniously enter and work together at the Polk-street Depot. The assertion which may be made that these roads are in strife and can not meet together peacefully in a depot has no foundation in fact and in practice, as shown by the history of the Chicago and Western Indiana road, which is actually the terminal of five great competing roads which enter the city together upon just such terms as I now propose for this station. It should be left open to the entry, upon fair terms, of any new roads that may be built to serve the people in the country and contribute to the commerce of Chicago, not forcing them to buy their way by the expenditure of many millions for other and entirely new terminals. It would be just to the people whose property we are parting with to this corporation, because we think it is for the public good; and in behalf of the people, who want all the railroad facilities they can get, this entry to Chicago should be open to future roads upon their paying their share.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WORTHINGTON addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Two competing roads can no more use the terminals and depot at the same time than they can use the same track. The ordinance which permits this road to enter into Chicago provides it comes in on the condition that it allows other roads to the capacity of the terminals and depots to use them. But a railway is valuable just as it makes its connections. If it is so hampered by limitations that a competing road can come in and desfroy the use it has of terminals, the utility of the road is destroyed. The roads that are permitted to use the company's terminals must be connecting roads that continue its track in different directions. It is for this reason that after very carefully considering the matter suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] the committee believe the word "non-competing" should be inserted in the bill. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. HITT. Has the gentleman from Illinois any time left in which he could answer a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman demands the previous question on the amendments and ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the committee. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to have the amendments read in their order.

The Clerk read the first amendment recommended by the committee, as follows:

In section 1, line 5, strike out the words "officers of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment recommended by the committee, as follows:

In section 1, line 5, after the word "three," insert the word "disinterested."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment recommended by the committee, as follows:

In section 1, line 30, after the word "assigns," insert the following:

"That all non-competing railroads not now having right of way into Chicago, desiring to use the tracks, switches, depots, and terminal facilities of said Chicago and Great Western Railroad, shall be, by said company or its assigns, permitted to do so, to the extent of the capacity of said company to furnish railroad terminal facilities, upon fair and equitable terms and regulations; and in the event the companies interested can not agree upon such terms and regulations, then the same shall be fixed and determined by three disinterested persons, one of whom shall be selected by said Chicago and Great Western Railroad Company, one by such other company as may desire to use said tracks, switches, and terminal facilities, and the third by the two persons so selected."

Mr. HOLMAN. There is an amendment to that, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. But that amendment was not in order, as the Chair stated at the time.

Mr. HITT. I offer it now.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] refused to admit that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I refer not to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] but to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois in charge of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is an amendment to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then this amendment ought not to be adopted, because this amendment provides for the appointment of these appraisers by divided authority.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That is so. The amendment I offered strikes out a part of this amendment recommended by the committee. I ask that my amendment be reported.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be reported. It is an amendment to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1, line 15, after the word "however," strike out all to and including the word "company," in the twenty-eighth line, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to direct said Secretary to make said sale unless he shall deem the price fixed by the commissioners or agreed to be paid by the said company to be a fair and reasonable price, and that the interests of the Government will not suffer by said sale.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That strikes out the second commission entirely and leaves the appraisers only.

Mr. HOLMAN. Appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is the effect of it, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. That is an amendment to the bill. The question is now on the amendment recommended by the committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall invest the purchase-money of the said lot received by him, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in the purchase or acquisition by condemnation of a site, and in the erection thereon of a suitable and commodious warehouse, for the use of the United States local appraiser of customs and other Government uses, in the city of Chicago. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the purchase-money received by the Secretary of the Treasury for the lot mentioned in the first section of this act; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said purchase-money received by the Secretary of the Treasury under this act for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Illinois shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein. And the act entitled 'An act for the erection of a public building at Chicago, Ill.,' approved March 3, 1885, is hereby repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] to the first section.

The amendment was again read; and was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the bill is subject to be read again at this stage.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to have the first part of the first section read as amended.

The first portion of section 1 as amended was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HITT. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with instructions to report the same back with the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the third amendment proposed by the committee the word "non-competing.".

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I hope that motion will not prevail. The matter has been very carefully considered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HITT, there were—ayes 51, noes 95.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

The bill was passed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICTS, NEBRASKA.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 1487, which is on the Private Calendar, and that the bill be taken up and put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all that portion of the State of Nebraska bounded and described as follows: Commencing on the west boundary of the State of Nebraska at the intersection of the township line between townships numbered 23 and 24 north, sixth principal meridian; thence east along the township line between said townships to the fifth guide meridian west; thence north along said guide meridian to the north boundary of the State of Nebraska; thence west along said boundary to the northwest corner of the State; thence south along the west boundary of the State to the place of beginning, be, and is hereby, constituted a new land district, to be called the northwest land district of the State of Nebraska, the land office for which shall be located at such place as the President may direct.

SEC. 2. That all that portion of the State of Nebraska bounded and described as follows: Beginning on the west boundary of the State of Nebraska at the point of the intersection of the township line between townships numbered 23 and 24 north, sixth principal meridian; thence east along the township line between said townships to the fifth guide meridian west; thence south on said fifth guide meridian to the southeast corner of township 12 north, range 41 west; thence west on the township line between townships 11 and 12 north to the west boundary of the State of Nebraska; thence north to the northeast corner of the State of Colorado; thence west along the north boundary of Colorado to the west boundary of the State of Nebraska; thence north along the west boundary of the State of Nebraska to the place of beginning, be, and is hereby, constituted a new land district, to be called the Sidney land district of the State of Nebraska, the land office for which shall be located at such place as the President may direct.

SEC. 3. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint registers and receive for such land districts, who shall discharge like and similar duties and receive the same amount of compensation as other officers discharging like duties in the other land offices of said State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object, but I wish to reserve the right to do so until I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill one or two questions, the answers to which may determine whether I shall object or not. I desire to ask the gentleman what number of acres of the public lands in Nebraska remain unsurveyed?

Mr. DORSEY. None, sir. All the public lands in the State of Nebraska have been surveyed and opened to settlement. This bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. These two new land districts will be about 125 miles in length from east to west, and 75 miles in width from north to south.

There are thousands of people pouring in there daily, and I have petitions on file from thousands of settlers asking that these districts be created, because some of those people are compelled now to go over 200 miles to a land office.

Mr. RANDALL. The reason I asked the question is that information had come to me that all the public lands in Nebraska had been surveyed, as the gentleman states they have been. The object of this bill, I suppose, is to afford additional facilities to people who desire to take up those lands for settlement.

Mr. DORSEY. I can say to the gentleman that this bill is in the interest of the people, and will tend to prevent frauds by giving the people land offices nearer their homes.

Mr. RANDALL. I make no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DORSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN FISHING REGULATIONS.

Mr. WILLIS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk, and to ask its present consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 5, 1886.

Whereas the minister of marine of the Dominion of Canada has issued a proclamation directing the enforcement of an act of the Dominion parliament which prohibits any fishing vessel of the United States from entering any Dominion harbor except for the purpose of shelter, repairing damages, and purchasing wood and obtaining water; and

Whereas press dispatches announce that under this proclamation Dominion officers have denied to fishing vessels of the United States the right to enter ports of entry in said Dominion for the purpose of purchasing supplies or landing fish caught in deep water for shipment in bond to the United States or doing other acts which Canadian and other British vessels are freely permitted to do in ports of the United States; and

Whereas these acts of the authorities of the Dominion of Canada are in contravention of the principles which regulate the intercourse of friendly civilized nations and in direct conflict with a legislative arrangement between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain which went into effect the 1st of January, 1850, by which Great Britain, in view of similar privileges conditionally conceded to her vessels by the United States, placed the vessels of the United States on the same footing in British ports, including British colonies, as that on which British vessels are placed in the ports of the United States, the coasting trade only excepted: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish the House, if compatible with the public interests, with any information in his possession relative to the exclusion of American fishing vessels from the ports of entry of the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of trading, purchasing supplies, or landing fish caught in deep water for shipment in bond to the United States, or doing other acts which Canadian and other British vessels are freely permitted to do in ports of the United States; and also to inform the House what steps have been taken or are proposed to bring such unwarrantable and unfriendly acts of the Dominion authorities to the attention of the British Government.

For which the committee propose the following substitute:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish the House, if compatible with the public interest, with any information in his possession relative to the exclusion of American fishing vessels from the right of entering ports of entry of the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of trading, purchasing supplies, or landing fish caught in deep water, for shipment in bond to the United States, or doing other acts which Canadian and other British vessels are freely permitted to do in ports of the United States, and also to inform the House what steps have been taken to bring such unwarrantable and unfriendly acts of the Dominion authorities to the attention of the British Government—

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the pending resolution of inquiry was offered by myself for the purpose of bringing before the House and the country the unwarrantable and unfriendly course of the Canadian authorities toward American fishing vessels, and emphasizing the fact that our Government enters its protest against such proceedings, and intends to follow up the protest until the vessels of the United States are accorded the same privileges in Canadian ports that are freely conceded to Canadian vessels in the ports of this country. The following correspondence shows that the Secretary of State is in accord with this view:

PORTLAND, April 9, 1886.

To Hon. Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.:

Having several fishing vessels ready for the Banks, we desire to know if they can enter Canadian ports for men and be protected in so doing.

CUSHING & McKENNEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 9, 1886.

To Cushing & McKenney, Portland, Me.:

The question of the right of American vessels engaged in fishing on the high seas, or entering the Canadian ports for the purpose of shipping crews, may possibly involve construction of treaty with Great Britain. I expect to attain such an understanding as will relieve our fishermen from all doubt or risk in the exercise of the ordinary commercial privileges in friendly ports, to which, under existing laws of both countries, I consider their citizens to be mutually entitled free from molestations.

T. F. BAYARD.

The right of an American fishing vessel, provided with a custom-house permit, to touch and trade, as authorized by section 4364 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to enter and purchase supplies of all kinds offered for sale, and ship fish in bond to the United States, is as clear as the right of any other American vessel. This right to touch and trade and buy whatever may be offered for sale in a Canadian port has nothing to do with the fishing rights under the treaty of 1818. We claim no right to fish within the 3-mile limit of Canadian shores, although we decline to accede to the Canadian construction of that limit.

The present difficulties, however, have nothing to do with any dispute as to the proper line of demarkation between fishing grounds exclusively belonging to Canada and fishing grounds open to us and to the world. Canada has undertaken to exclude American vessels intending to fish in waters beyond even Canadian jurisdiction from Canadian ports for the purpose of purchasing supplies, including bait and ice, landing fish caught in deep water to be shipped in bond to the United States, and doing other acts which Canadian fishing and other vessels are freely permitted to do in our ports.

The following proclamation of the minister of marine of the Dominion of Canada shows what is the unwarrantable and unfriendly course which the Dominion authorities have mapped out:

PROCLAMATION BY THE CANADIAN MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES.

The Government of the United States having by notice terminated articles 18 to 25, both inclusive, and article 30, known as the fishery articles of the Washington treaty, attention is called to the following provision of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at London on the 20th October, 1818:

"Article 1. Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, from said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Bell Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson's Bay Company; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled, without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

"And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

Attention is called to the following provisions of the act of the parliament of Canada, chapter 61 of the acts of 1868, an act respecting "fishing by foreign vessels."

2. Any commissioned officer of Her Majesty's navy, serving on board of any vessel of Her Majesty's navy, cruising and being in the waters of Canada for purpose of affording protection to Her Majesty's subjects engaged in the fisheries, or any commissioned officer of Her Majesty's navy, fishery officer, or stipendiary magistrate on board of any vessel belonging to or in the service of the government of Canada and employed in the service of protecting the fisheries, or any officer of the customs of Canada, sheriff, magistrate, or other person duly commissioned for that purpose, may go on board any ship, vessel, or boat, within any harbor in Canada, or hovering (in British waters) within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors in Canada, and stay on board so long as she may remain within such place or distance.

3. If such ship, vessel, or boat be bound elsewhere, and shall continue within such harbor, or so hovering for twenty-four hours after the master shall have been required to depart, any one of such officers or persons as are above mentioned may bring such ship, vessel, or boat into port and search her cargo, and may also examine the master upon oath touching the cargo and voyage; and if the master or person in command shall not truly answer the questions put to him in such examination he shall forfeit $400; and if such ship, vessel, or boat be foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada, and have been found fishing, or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing (in British waters) within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of Canada, not included within the above-mentioned limits, without a license, on or after the expiration of the period named in the last license granted to such ship, vessel, or boat under the first section of this act, such ship, vessel, or boat, and the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores, and cargo thereof shall be forfeited.

4. All goods, ships, vessels, and boats, and the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores, and cargo liable to forfeiture under this act, may be seized and secured by any officers or persons mentioned in the second section of this act, and every person opposing any officer or person in the execution of his duty under this act, or aiding or abetting any other person in any opposition, shall forfeit $800, and shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

Therefore be it known that, by virtue of the treaty provisions and act of parliament above recited, all foreign vessels or boats are forbidden from fishing or taking fish by any means whatever within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors in Canada, or to enter such bays, harbors, and creeks except for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever; of all of which you will take notice and govern yourself accordingly.

GEORGE E. FOSTER,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES,
Ottawa, 5th March, 1886.

Canada undertakes to justify her unfriendly acts toward American fishing vessels by reference to a provision of the old treaty of 1818, in which it is provided that—

American fishermen shall be admitted to enter Canadian bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever.

Whatever may have been intended by this provision in 1818, when all American vessels were excluded from the commercial privileges enjoyed by British vessels in Canadian ports and all Canadian and other British vessels from the privileges enjoyed by American vessels in the ports of the United States, it should be borne in mind that since that time there has been reciprocal legislation by both countries, culminating with a reciprocal legislative arrangement which took effect January 1, 1850, having all the force of a solemn treaty, by which Great Britain and the United States have placed the vessels of each nation, respectively, on the same footing in all their ports, including the colonies of Great Britain.

Granting that the treaty of 1818 did exclude American fishing vessels from Canadian ports except for the four purposes named, yet these legislative arrangements and reciprocal agreements have swept away the discriminations of both nations against each other's vessels, and placed American fishing vessels, which have all the privileges of touching and trading at foreign ports accorded to other American vessels on the same footing in Canadian ports that Canadian vessels are placed in the ports of the United States. Canadian fishing vessels are freely permitted to enter our ports to purchase whatever they may want, including bait and ice, to ship fish in bond to Canada, and to do other acts which national comity permits.

The United States demands of Great Britain that the reciprocal arrangements as to the rights of vessels of either nation in the ports of the other shall be faithfully observed by her Canadian dependency. I can not doubt that Great Britain, on representation which will be made to her by our Government, will recognize the reciprocal rights of American fishing vessels and put an end to the vexatious and unwarrantable course of the Canadian authorities toward them. If she should refuse to do so, then I trust we shall act promptly in withdrawing from Canadian vessels in our ports privileges which she refuses to vessels of the United States. Without further legislation the President is authorized by the act of 1823 to issue his proclamation withdrawing the privileges now granted the vessels of any foreign country which discriminates against American vessels in her ports.

The object of the Canadian authorities in their vexatious and unwarrantable treatment of American fishing vessels which have no intention of fishing in Canadian waters is so plain that no one can fail to understand it. They are seeking to force the American people and the American Congress to admit Canadian fish free of duty into the United States. The Canadian market wants but a small portion of the fish caught by Canadian fishermen. The United States has a most valuable market, and the Canadians desire the privilege of bringing their fish here and selling them without paying a duty. The exports of Canadian fish to the United States rose from eighty-four and one-half thousand dollars in 1871 to three and three-fourths millions in 1884. Twice have they driven the United States to enter into a treaty admitting Canadian fish free of duty—in 1854 and again in 1871—by vexing and troubling our fishing vessels until our Government was wheedled into making bargains which seriously damaged American fishing interests. To be sure the treaty of 1871, which admitted American fishermen to Canadian waters for the purpose of fishing, was thought at the time to be favorable to our fishing interests, but the result proved far otherwise.

On the 1st day of July last the United States got rid of the last bad bargain, and since that time Canadian-cured fish have been charged a duty when brought into our markets. Before even the last arrangement terminated the Canadians set to work to secure a commission to make another arrangement by which their fish should be admitted to our markets free of duty. They even persuaded the President and Secretary of State to recommend such a commission, but the protests of the fishing interests of the country have been so earnest and strong against another sacrifice of our fishermen, that it is now evident that Congress will not carry out the plan. The emphatic vote of the Senate on Senator FRYE'S resolution disapproving a commission settles this point.

Angered by our refusal, the Canadian authorities have commenced the vexatious course toward our fishing vessels to which I have alluded. They have sent an armed schooner to the fishing grounds to annoy and seize our fishing vessels on various pretexts, and they have warned our vessels not to enter Canadian ports for commercial purposes, to purchase bait or ice, or for other objects, which their vessels are freely permitted to pursue in our ports.

When it is borne in mind that American fishing vessels are not seeking to fish in Canadian waters, but in waters in which it is admitted they have a right to pursue their calling, and that their visits to Canadian ports have reference only to purchasing supplies for their legitimate business, the attempt of the Canadians to deprive them of ordinary commercial privileges in their ports in order to annoy our fishermen and make this legitimate business impracticable is not only inexcusable but unfriendly. If Canada persists in this course and Great Britain declines to interfere, nothing remains but to take the remedy into our own hands. We prefer to avoid retaliation, but nothing else would be left to us. If American fishing vessels, duly authorized to touch and trade and pursuing a legitimate business in waters outside of Canadian jurisdiction are not to be permitted to enter Canadian ports for the purpose of purchasing supplies of any kind offered for sale and shipping fish in bond to the United States, then Canadian vessels should be denied similar privileges in the ports of the United States.

It can not be admitted for a moment that Canada has any right to interfere in the tariff policy of this country so long as we impose no higher duties on her products than we do on the similar products of any other foreign country. We claim no right on the other hand to interfere in the tariff policy of Canada, and she would justly regard any such interference on our part as an impertinence.

The policy of this country, except in the periods when so-called reciprocal treaties have provided otherwise, has always been to impose duties on imported fish as a measure of protection to our own fishermen. So long as the general policy of the country has been protective, simple justice has demanded that the fishing interests should receive the same measure of protection as other industries. The hardy fishermen who man our fishing vessels deserve our protection and encouragement.

But there has been a reason beyond this which has led our Government in the past to have special regard for our fishing interests. The sea fisheries have ever been the nursery of seamen—the school in which have been trained the men who have manned our cruisers in time of war. The value of this school has been attested in every war in which we have been engaged. It was New England fishermen who manned our naval vessels in the war of 1812, and wrung victory from British cruisers in many a bloody contest. Every naval nation has encouraged the sea fisheries as a resource in time of war. For many years we gave a large bounty to encourage the fishing interests. That bounty was withdrawn twenty years ago, but we can not take away the inducement to maintain the fisheries offered by exclusive possession of our markets without destroying the sea fisheries and depriving the country of an invaluable school for seamen to man our vessels in time of war.

In view of these considerations it is to me a matter of great surprise that the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means have reported a bill to admit all imported fish free of duty. If such a step was contemplated it should be done by a reciprocal treaty, which would give us something from Canada in return. She stands ready to-day to give us a bonus for a privilege which makes her fisheries prosperous.

But such a step should not be taken on any consideration. It would assuredly destroy our sea fisheries. It would do grave injustice to the hardy fishermen who pursue a calling so hazardous and yet so beneficial to the country. It would deprive us of the most valuable school for seamen to man our vessels in time of war that any nation can possess. I can not believe that Congress will adopt so unjust and unwise a policy.

Instead of placing all kinds of imported fish on the free-list, as is proposed, a law should be enacted imposing a duty upon fresh fish of all kinds, herring only excepted, which are now admitted free of duty when intended for immediate consumption, or at least a law giving a proper construction to the term "fresh fish." Under the present law the Treasury Department has ruled that fish preserved by freezing and ice are still "fresh fish." Under this construction fish preserved by freezing and ice are being brought into our markets by Canadians in large quantities free of duty. With modern methods of freezing and preserving this decision is seriously interfering with our fishing interests. Obviously, instead of placing all fish on the free-list a measure should be passed, as I have already proposed, to construe fresh fish as not including frozen fish or fish preserved by the use of ice, salt, freezing, smoking, or other preservative process.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of State will not only at once bring to the attention of the British Government the unwarranted course of the Canadian authorities in endeavoring to deprive American fishing vessels of the rights in Canadian ports which belong to us under reciprocal "legislative arrangement," but will also follow this up by securing a just settlement of the disputed question of the proper construction of the 3-mile limit within which only Canadian vessels are entitled to fish. I take it for granted that a just decision of this controversy will dissipate the absurd headland claim under which Canadians have sometimes endeavored to claim the exclusive right to fish in waters of great gulfs and arms of the ocean. This claim is so preposterous that British ministers have repeatedly declined to enforce it. It is important, however, that the line of demarkation between Canadian fishing-grounds and those that belong to us and the world should no longer be in doubt, and thus give to Canada a pretext for annoying American fishing vessels in deep water on the false claim that they were fishing in Canadian waters.

It is time that the interests of American fishermen should be as scrupulously and persistently guarded as the similar interests of other nations are guarded by them. In 1880, according to the last census, the number of persons employed in the fisheries of the United States was 131,426, of whom over one hundred thousand were schooled in the management of boats and other vessels; and 80 per cent. of those were American citizens. There were employed 6,605 vessels and 44,804 boats, with a capital of nearly $40,000,000 invested. The value of the products of the fisheries was $44,546,063. The value of the products in a marketable condition of the 606 fishing vessels and 5,920 boats of the State of Maine, which I have the honor to represent in part on this floor, was $3,614,178.

It will be seen, therefore, that, considered simply as an industry supplying food to our people, our fisheries are of great importance. But important as is their commercial value, their value as a nursery of seamen for our merchant marine and for our Navy, especially as a resource in time of war, can not be overestimated. I appeal confidently to the sense of justice and the patriotism of the House to protect and encourage the fishing interests of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, for myself I have no objection to the suggestion that this legislative branch of the Government shall indicate by its action in favor of this proposition that we mean, so far as the power rests here, to watch carefully and to maintain firmly all the rights of the American fishermen who are engaged in the trade to which the resolution relates.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to state that the many recitals contained in the preamble of the original resolution are not embodied in the substitute, which is merely a resolution of inquiry in regard to this question. Seeking for information looking to the protection of the rights of American fishermen in Canadian waters, I do not deem a discussion of the question necessary in advance of the official information sought.

The question being taken, the substitute proposed by the committee was agreed to, and the resolution as amended adopted.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. After consultation with a number of gentlemen on both sides of the House I feel it to be my duty, although with reluctance, to test the disposition of the House as to going on to-day with the general appropriation bill now pending in preference to private business. With this view I move to dispense with private business for this day.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before that question is put I hope the gentleman will yield to me to have read for information a resolution I desire to offer on this subject and upon which I would like to have a vote. It pertains to the private business, and will not interfere with the gentleman's proposition. I desire to see whether we can not reach some agreement in regard to private business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to reading the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]?

Mr. FELTON. I object.

Mr. DUNHAM. Have we not the right to hear it read before objection is made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent; and as the proceeding is not regular, no part of it can take place unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. Unless it is read, the House can not tell what the request is.

The SPEAKER. Still gentlemen have the right to insist on the regular order and to object to the reading of anything which is not included in the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I make no opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], for I think that the Private Calendar in the ordinary method of its consideration ought not to stand in the way of important public business.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WILLIS, there were—ayes 67, noes 83.

Mr. WILLIS. I have great respect for the opinion of this House, and I shall not attempt to press my motion any further.

So the motion of Mr. WILLIS was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the Chair will proceed to call the standing and select committees for reports of a private nature.

SARAH ANN WILLIAMS.

Mr. HAYNES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 6919) granting a pension to Sarah Ann Williams; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HAYNES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 6503) granting a pension to Storer E. Stiles; and A bill (H. R. 7333) for the relief of Ann Cowan.

WILLIAM H. STARR.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6718) granting a pension to William H. Starr; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELANDER M. MOONEYHAN.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 6801) granting a pension to Elander M. Mooneyhan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RICHARD HORRIGAN.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 6120) for the relief of Richard Horrigan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

STOKELEY D. DAGLEY.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6655) granting a pension to Stokeley D. Dagley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 7309) granting a pension to Charles M. Hamilton;
A bill (H. R. 6798) granting a pension to William D. Acuff; and
A bill (H. R. 6447) granting a pension to Daniel F. Mack.

MARGARET MADDEN.

Mr. PINDAR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 4143) for the relief of Margaret Madden; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CATHARINE S. TODD.

Mr. PINDAR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 4166) to increase the pension of Catharine S. Todd; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT GRAY.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 620) granting a pension to Robert Gray; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY BOLLMAN.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3366) granting a pension to Henry Bollman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SARAH BROOKS.

Mr. SWOPE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3645) granting a pension to Sarah Brooks; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. SWOPE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back adverely bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 2092) granting an increase of pension to Isaiah W. Bunker;
A bill (H. R. 6244) granting a pension to Henry Berry;
A bill (H. R. 4711) granting a pension to John W. Blake; and
A bill (H. R. 6374) for the relief of Henrietta Harman.

JAMES MADISON PRUITT.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 5051) to place the name of James Madison Pruitt on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 6103) granting a pension to George Chambers; and
A bill (H. R. 1263) granting a pension to Jared D. Wheelock.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. O'HARA, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7484) for the relief of Algernon M. Cook; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

LEVI JONES.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4629) for the relief of Levi Jones; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF THOMAS BLACK.

Mr. PERRY, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2214) for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Black; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JESSE H. STRICKLAND.

Mr. KLEINER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1623) to muster Jesse H. Strickland as colonel of cavalry in the service of the United States, and to pay him for his services from January 30, 1863 to March 31, 1864, inclusive.

Mr. JAMES and Mr. RICHARDSON both asked the adverse report be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The adverse report was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON T. OTEY.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4882) granting a pension to Washington T. Otey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF FOR VOLUNTEER OFFICERS, ETC.

Mr. LAIRD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1427, a bill (H. R. 7895) for the relief of certain officers of the volunteer army, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. Does this make or require an appropriation to be made?

Mr. LAIRD. I believe not.

The bill was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL NOBLE.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, when I submitted the report from the Judiciary Committee of the bill (H. R. 7889) for the relief of Samuel Noble, I forgot at the moment my agreement to notify the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY], as he desired to submit the views of the minority.

Mr. SENEY, by unanimous consent, presented the views of the minority in that case; and they were ordered to be printed with the majority report.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion to go into committee, I ask that the resolution which I send to the desk be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Tuesday during the remainder of this session the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills, other than pension bills, shall be considered. And that on each Friday during the session, after this day, public business shall be in order until 5 o'clock p. m.

Resolved further, That when the House at such evening sessions shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar, as herein provided, it shall be in order to take up bills in their order, and after five minutes' time given to an explanation thereof the question shall be put to the committee whether there is objection to the present consideration of the bill; and if five persons object to its consideration, such bill shall be passed over informally and the next bill shall be taken up for consideration in like manner. Bills to the consideration of which there are not five persons objecting shall be subject to ten minutes' debate, five minutes in favor of the bill and five minutes against it; when the question shall be put upon laying the bill aside to be reported to the House.

After the Calendar has been called through once under this order, private bills shall thereafter be considered under the rules of the House, as heretofore provided.

Mr. SPRINGER. This does not relate to the day at all.

The SPEAKER. The only request made by the gentleman from Illinois was it should be read for information.

Mr. DUNHAM. I suggest it be printed in the RECORD and brought up some other day.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well; if there be no objection let it lie over.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is understood it has no right to consideration.

The SPEAKER. Certainly not. It is only asked to be read and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. If there be no objection I will move it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If the gentleman desires to call it up hereafter he will have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will ask to have it referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will accommodate the gentleman from Maine if I can.

Mr. DUNHAM. There is no objection to its going to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. There is objection made by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. SPRINGER. Nothing gives me more pleasure than to accommodate the gentleman from Maine. If it offends him, I will never mention it again.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members demanded the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I know it is not debatable, but I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. On Friday last a number of bills were reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole, and my inquiry is when and in what manner they will be reached for final action by the House?

The SPEAKER. They will be the first bills taken up for consideration when the committee rises to-day—the first in the class of business to which they belong reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the title of the bill under consideration when the committee last rose.

M'MINNVILLE AND MANCHESTER RAILROAD.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5194) directing the Quartermaster-General to settle with the M'Minnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Friday last it was dividing on the question submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] of laying this bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. There having been no decision of the committee upon that subject, I ask to withdraw the motion. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] in charge of the bill desires to reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] at that time. Had I known the fact I should not have submitted the motion; and since I do not desire to deprive him of any advantage which he might have by replying to those remarks, I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the motion will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I have a right to withdraw it, there being no decision.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the committee was dividing upon the question at the time the committee rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. But no quorum having appeared, and no decision having been reached, I have the right to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. On last Friday I submitted the considerations which I thought ought to move the committee to favor the passage of this bill. I must confess that I was somewhat surprised at the very fierce onslaught made on the measure by the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES]. I was somewhat astonished at the earnestness with which he made the attack and the zeal he then displayed. I think, with all due respect to my able friend, that he was rather extravagant in his assertions as to why the bill should not pass and the reasons he assigned in opposition to it. He starts out, Mr. Chairman (and I read from his remarks), as printed in the RECORD, by saying:

It is one of the most obnoxious measures that could be presented as an entering-wedge for a class of claims which in amount would aggregate a sum equal to the national debt at the close of the war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at the same time he told the committee that of the fifty railroads in the South that became involved in their accounts with the General Government, every one had settled its indebtedness with the exception of four. Then by his own statement, sir, there are but four roads whose accounts have not been settled, adjusted, paid, or compromised; and yet we have the remarkable statement from the able chairman of this committee that the accounts of these four railroads amount in the aggregate to an indebtedness greater than the war debt at its close, or over $2,600,000,000.

Mr. GEDDES. Let me interrupt by asking my colleague to recognize at once the fact that the class of claims to which I referred is by no means limited to these railroads. It embraces many others.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What other can possibly stand upon such a footing as this? If there is any other case, Mr. Chairman, in which the Government of the United States, by its authorities, took the property of a citizen, artificial or real, and appropriated it to its own use, and then sold it to a third party and obtained money for it, it seems to me that we can not make a better precedent than to pay this. I say that there are no such claims in existence to the amount indicated by the gentleman in his remarks.

Now, he said, and I take his statement as true, because the Quartermaster-General's report shows it, that there are about four roads whose accounts are unsettled, and which amount in the aggregate to about $1,000,000, so that would hardly swamp the Government financially if we undertake to pay all of them. But that is not so. There is no other railroad whose affairs are in that condition or who came here asking for such relief.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the line of the extravagant statement of the gentleman, and the zeal he displayed in opposing the payment of a just claim like this, he says further:

That you Tennessee people have already got two bills passed through this House making large appropriations.

And when he is reminded that these bills included claims in a large number of States, New York and others, he replied:

"Yes; in New York there is $1.50 allowed." Now, I have the bill before me, and it shows $150 to the State of New York, so that the gentleman is out only about 1,000,000 per cent. in his estimate of the amount that goes to that State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to go further at this time into an answer to many of the statements made by my friend from Ohio; but I may do so before my time is up. I wanted to say that much. And now I shall yield to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. PERRY], who, I understand, desires the floor, and I ask him to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that I may reserve the remaining few minutes I am entitled to.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from South Carolina can take the floor in his own right.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Before the gentleman from Tennessee takes his seat I ask him, as he reported this bill, to read that part of the petition of the McMinnville and Manchester road which asks Congress to take this action, and also to show from the records he has had control of the right that the Memphis and Charleston road has to this appropriation, and also to show the order upon which the McMinnville and Manchester road was sold and the amount for which it was sold by the State of Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would do anything in the world to please the gentleman from Indiana, but I do not understand his inquiry. The Memphis and Charleston road has nothing to do with this. The gentleman has got the record and can read it in his own time.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I have not got the record. I ask this question because those facts are not shown by the record. If they are in the record, I can not find them.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can not answer the gentleman's question. The Memphis and Charleston road has no connection with this road or its claim.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I know the gentleman can not answer it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think it is wholly immaterial.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PERRY] is recognized.

Mr. PERRY. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] for such time as he desires it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I shall not, Mr. Chairman, trespass long upon the patience of the House in the discussion of this case, because the facts upon which it turns, and upon which payment is to be made, if made at all, may be put in a nutshell. What are they?

Under an act of Congress passed the 31st January, 1862, the President of the United States was authorized to direct the taking of the railroads of the country for the use of the Government during the mighty struggle that was then in progress whenever it became necessary. The Government did take possession of this McMinnville and Manchester road and the Nashville and Chattanooga road. What did it do when it got possession? Not needing the road in controversy because it was only an arm of the Nashville and Chattanooga road, it proceeded to take up the iron from this road, the switches, the chairs, and spikes, and carried them to the Nashville and Chattanooga road, which needed rails, &c., and put them down upon that road and used them. Now it will not be denied by the most strenuous opponent of this bill that the Government took the road, that it took up the rails, that it carried the material to the Nashville and Chattanooga road; that, having done so, it put it down there, and used it as long as it wanted it. That is incontrovertible.

What is the next step in the case? The next action of the Government was when the war was over that it returned the Nashville and Chattanooga road to its management. Before doing so it said, "We have added valuable improvements to this road; we have placed more rolling-stock upon it, we have put down more rails, and we ask you in accepting this road to pay us for the rails so put down and material furnished."

Mr. GEDDES. Where do you find that?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is in the record of the case.

Mr. GEDDES. Just read me one line on that subject.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will read you more than one line.

Mr. GEDDES. Read from the proof in the case—not from any speech.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will read from the evidence of this case, and that can not be successfully disputed. Employés who originally worked upon the McMinnville and Manchester road were sent and made an investigation of the property after it was taken to the Chattanooga road and identified it.

Mr. GEDDES. That is correct.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman does not deny that. I will read their testimony:

A. Powers and S. S. Mahoney, being sworn, depose and say: That they are now, and before the late war were well acquainted with the line of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad, its road-bed, and the iron laid upon the same; that during the late war the said road, with the greater part of its machinery and property, was occupied by the United States forces; that previous to said capture the said affiants were employed on the said road; that a large amount of the iron rails of said road were by the forces and authority of the United States taken up and removed. That said affiants have carefully examined a quantity of the iron rails now held by the United States in the hand of Capt. and Bvt. Maj. S. S. Hammill, assistant quartermaster at Nashville, Tenn., and from such examination they find that of rails so held by the United States two hundred and seventy rails or bars belong to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and are, as affiants believe, part and parcel of the same rails taken up and removed from the road-bed of the said company as above stated.

Then there was the report of the Quartermaster-General, made years afterward, which recited and admitted the fact that the rails were laid down on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad track. The Nashville and Chattanooga road was improved by their use, and I have never heard any man deny it before. I have been over the road dozens of times, and it is the history of the country there, undisputed and indisputable.

Now, having got through with the use of the property, what does the Government do? It calls upon the Nashville and Chattanooga road, as I have stated, to pay for all of the property that it had added to that road while in its possession.

Mr. GEDDES. There is the trouble. Show me the proof of that. Now you strike it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The bond of that company shows it. Does not the Government of the United States to-day hold the bond of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company for the property placed there by the Government? Does not that establish the fact beyond controversy? Who would want better proof? Who could give better?

Mr. GEDDES. Not at all. Not for one cent's worth.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It does not?

Mr. GEDDES. I will read from the record if you will allow me.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman is wholly in error. If the gentleman desires to ask a question, I will yield for that, but not for his speech.

Mr. GEDDES. Well, for a question: Have you read the record containing the evidence upon which this claim is based? If you have, do you not find in that record proof of the direct reverse of your claim here—proof that instead of asking pay of either of these roads for any of the iron taken off, they returned to the McMinnville and Manchester road gratuitously every rail that could be identified, and never charged the other road one penny for anything that they received?

Mr. MCMILLIN. There was not, so far as I have been able to see, one single rail returned. On the contrary, ex-judge and ex-Congressman H. H. Harrison, one of the directors of the road, called upon General Thomas for a settlement of the accounts. General Thomas had an investigation made, and a report was made by his officers in which they admit the taking and carrying away and using of 25½ miles of the rails of the McMinnville and Manchester road.

Mr. GEDDES. No one denies that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is the history of the case.

Mr. GEDDES. You do not come to the point of trouble.

Mr. MCMILLIN. No; the point of trouble with you is paying for that which the Government took.

Mr. GEDDES. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. You hesitate to pay for it.

Mr. GEDDES. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Now the Government has obtained from the Nashville and Chattanooga company a bond for that property. And I do unhesitatingly say that when the Government got the rails of this company, used them on the Nashville and Chattanooga road, turned the road over to the Chattanooga management after the close of the war, and got a bond from that company to pay for that property, the Government can not afford to refuse to give that bond, or a fair proportion of it, to pay for the 25½ miles of rail which belonged to the McMinnville and Manchester company. That is what I say, and that is the strength of this case, and it is justice.

Mr. GEDDES. Let me read from the record.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would rather the gentleman would read it in his own time, as my time is limited. The gentleman has an opportunity to read whatever he wishes. These are the facts. Much of the record has been read here. I have in my pocket the order made by General Thomas for the appraisement of the value of the property, the return of the officers who made the appraisement; and the amount in this bill is less than they said was actually due; yet gentlemen hesitate to make payment. Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, about this case establishing a bad precedent. It is a late day to talk about precedents when you have settled with forty-six of the fifty roads that were used by the Government already. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] has said that the management of the road, or perhaps the road itself, was rebellious—in other words, had committed treason. It is the first time that I have heard a claim resisted in Congress upon so flimsy a pretext.

It is known to all men that during the war, when the confederates were in that country and wanted to pass over any road or any part of it they passed over it, and that when the United States forces wanted to travel over any road they did it. Whichever army was occupying the country used the existing facilities for transportation, and all the powers then in existence, either corporate or individual, would have been ineffectual to prevent that. Therefore, to say that this claim should not be paid because at some time this road was used by those who were in the military service of the confederacy and whom the Government of the United States itself was not able to expel, is to place argument upon a puerile ground that is unworthy of Congress and untenable in any tribunal that pretends to act justly.

Much has been said too about this property being taken by the Army. Why, sir, the Army took horses, and you paid for them; it took provisions, and you paid for them; it took fuel, and you paid for that; and to say that you will not pay for anything because it was captured is just to say that you will not pay for anything at all. Where is the distinction?

Mr. HOLMAN. We did not pay for horses captured.

Mr. MCMILLIN. You did not?

Mr. HOLMAN. No.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Why, I have voted to pay for hundreds of horses taken in your own State during the Morgan raid for the use of the Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, I think my friend is mistaken about that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am not mistaken.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman [Mr. HOLMAN] wants to make his record straight I have no objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no necessity for making my record straight or crooked. It is the crooked record which my friend is making that I am trying to straighten out.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The crookedness is in my friend's vision, not in the record. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. The Government has paid for all horses taken and appropriated to the uses of the Government——

Mr. MCMILLIN. Exactly; that is what I have stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. In States like Indiana and Ohio——

Mr. MCMILLIN. And Tennessee, and West Virginia, and Maryland, and Kentucky, and Missouri. In all those States the Army would come along and capture the horses of citizens——

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend talks about "capturing" and about "captured" property. The Government has never paid for any property captured.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My friend says the Government pays for property when it "takes" it, but not when it "captures" it. I would like to know the difference between taking and capturing.

Mr. HOLMAN. The difference is very marked. When the Army passing through the country found it necessary to take horses from loyal people for the use of its troops the Government has paid for horses so taken; but the idea of paying for captured property has never been even suggested.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have not insisted nor has any other man in his senses insisted that property captured as an act of war from parties actually in arms against the Government has been the subject of payment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now my friend sees the importance of the correction which I made.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Here is the distinction which I draw: The Government does not pay ravages of war—mere ravages. But when the property is taken for the use of the Army, and the owner is not barred by disloyalty, or statutes of limitations, then the Government does pay for the actual use and benefit which it gets out of the property. That is the distinction, and it is drawn in this very case. Where the turn-tables were destroyed, this report does not propose to pay for them; where bridges were burned, they are not to be paid for; the depot buildings destroyed are not to be paid for—why? Upon our distinction that these were "ravages" of war. But where property was taken and converted by the Government to Government use, and part of it sold to another party and a bond taken for the purchase-money, the Government having drawn interest upon that bond for twenty years, the claim for compensation can not be rejected without flagrant violation of every principle of justice.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend has referred to the act of January 31, 1862, authorizing the military authorities to take possession of all the railroads of the United States; that act has been referred to by the gentleman as the law underlying this claim. At the time now under consideration this railroad property was in the hands of men waging war against the United States. The Government captured that property, did it not, by its Army, and then did not that property come under the law touching captured and abandoned property, and not under the act of January 31, 1862?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Not at all. It was immovable property, used by who ever occupied the country it ran through. General Albert Sidney Johnson, commanding the confederate forces, occupied the city of Bowling Green, Ky., and all of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad south of Bowling Green to Nashville. He used that road for the transportation of his troops; he carried his supplies over it; he used it in every way in which a railroad could be used by a belligerent force. But the man has not yet been born who will say that because that road was so used therefore the Government when it obtained possession of the road could confiscate it or did confiscate it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Government captured it, however.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The Government "captured" it just as it did this road. And what did it do when it got it? It entered into a contract with the management of the road, if I remember correctly, to pay large rates over the road, and thereby made it one of the richest corporations in the world having the same length of road.

Mr. GEDDES. That was after the war was over.

Mr. MCMILLIN. During the war.

Mr. GEDDES. Oh, no.

Mr. MCMILLIN. During the war. I speak only from memory, but think the gentleman will find that the Government paid for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I guess not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Gentlemen will observe that the stock of this road rose during the war, instead of falling; I mean the Louisville and Nashville road. And I wish to state further, in order to show that that case was as strong as this can possibly be, that the Louisville and Nashville road was composed of two corporations, one under the law of the State of Kentucky, extending to the Kentucky line in the direction of Nashville, the other under the law of Tennessee, extending to Kentucky in the direction of Louisville. Tennessee was a seceding State. Yet the Government never confiscated the Lousville and Nashville road. That is the history of the matter. I insist that the plainest principles of justice and fair dealing between the citizen and his Government demand that the Government shall pay for the benefits which it obtained from this McMinnville and Manchester road by the use and sale of its iron, &c.

What hardship will be wrought by doing even the best that it is proposed to do here? The Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company has had to pay interest on its bonds from the date of the settlement, soon after the war, down to the present time—about twenty years—and they will have paid in interest upon these bonds more than the amount of the principal. Yet under this bill, giving to this road only the value of these rails, only the value of property which the Government obtained and used, not what it destroyed, it is proposed not to pay one cent of interest. I am not complaining of this, for it is the policy which the Government has pursued with all claimants—to pay no interest. But I am showing the hardship to which this railroad is subjected even if compensation be made as now proposed.

Mr. GEDDES. My friend I know wants to be accurate, but he would leave on my mind, if I did not know all about this record, this impression: That this Nashville and Chattanoga road had incurred an indebtedness to the Government upon which they had paid interest for upward of twenty years; when the record shows this to be the fact, that their purchase from the Government aggregated one million seven hundred and odd thousands of dollars, and the Government afterward compromised with the company, and gave up seven hundred and odd thousand dollars, and insisted only upon the payment of a million of dollars of that indebtedness upon $1,700,000.

Then I wish to state this other additional fact: That bill for rolling-stock, and iron, and property furnished new after the war was no part of the iron and other property taken from that or any other company.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In the latter part of his statement is where the gentleman is in error. There he certainly is.

Mr. GEDDES. Furnish the evidence.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I admit his case so far as he has accurately stated it. The Government did demand of that road such bond as no conscionable officer. after the excitement of war had gone and prices had fallen, would exact the payment of. One million seven hundred thousand dollars was demanded after using the company's rolling-stock and roadbed for years. After the clouds had passed away it was admitted on all hands that was an exorbitant demand on the part of the Government. The rolling-stock obtained had been badly worn, and the rails put down had been in a great measure worn out by the Government itself. It was, therefore, a claim of that kind, and not as a set-off against payment of interest that any such remission was made. That is the fact of the case. I do not understand that for the part claimed there is a dollar of interest remitted which can be claimed as a set-off for this. I do not understand the fact to be that way. However that may be, the fact, as I said in the beginning, is at least in a nutshell. Is it not a fact that the property was taken by the Government from that corporation? Is it not a fact that the officers of the Government have not returned the road in the condition in which it was when they took it? This difference of value is what the Government owes.

Gentlemen on the other side have said that General Thomas did not recognize it. Ought it not to be considered a recognition by him of the justice of this claim when he issued his order for a report as to what was the value of the material taken off, and what it would cost to place it in the condition it was in when the Government took possession of it?

When gentlemen come to vote on this bill the only question for them to determine is whether they will make restitution of the property the Government took and kept or sold.

We ask no pay for burned-down houses, we ask no pay for destroyed depots, we ask no pay for torn-up bridges, we ask no pay for the mutilations and ravages of war, but only for that the Government took, kept, and used or sold; and we do insist this great country would do itself a great wrong by standing back and declining to do even-handed justice to one or more of the citizens it was organized to protect.

Mr. PERRY. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the ground of opposition to the payment of this claim, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] the other day, is that it would be more manly for this corporation to come here and say, by the ravages of war you got our property, by right of capture you had it; and now we want you to pay us for it. In order to establish his proposition he assumes that we are here demanding pay for property taken as an act of war; he takes the deposition of an employé of the railroad who used the word "captured," and stands on that. I submit to any man who wants to be fair whether this is not straining and wresting the testimony, to say this man used the word "captured" in any sense which would justify a lawyer of any prominence in holding it would include us in the category of demanding pay for captured and abandoned property. The expression was used by this employé in the common parlance of the time, and in no other sense.

There is no tribunal to decide for us or anybody else this property was captured. You will have to decide how this property came into the possession of the Government, not by the unlettered and unguarded expression of a couple of railroad hands, but by the facts of the case and the law which governs them.

How did this road get into the hands of the Government? Did it come into the hands of the Government like the salt-works to which General Grant alludes in his message? Certainly not. Those salt-works were destroyed to keep the confederate forces from getting the benefit of them. It was the destruction of property as an act of war to decrease the power of resistance on the part of the public enemy.

That was not a case where private property was taken and applied to public uses in any sense of the Constitution, he says; that was an open and flagrant act of destruction in the carrying on of the war then in progress.

Now, what are the facts? How did this property get into the hands of the Government at all? Did it come into its possession by seizure or capture actually upon the theater of war, or did it come into its hands under the act of 1862? Let us examine the question now for a moment.

The gentleman from Ohio expresses great alarm if this case shall be allowed by the Congress of the United States that it would form a precedent for a raid upon the Treasury that would bankrupt the Government; for, he said, it would probably result in demands upon the Treasury equal in amount to the national debt at the close of the war.

Mr. Chairman, I can not help the fact of the gentleman's getting alarmed, but let us see how he is scared and what he is scared at. I have, in my own experience, seen many men with defective vision get scared at objects at night, and let us see for a moment if this is not an imaginary apprehension which the gentleman from Ohio has conjured up in his own brain to get frightened about.

It is a matter of great regret, sir, in the history of this country that the gentleman from Ohio did not get scared soon enough, and that he was not in Congress at the time the act of January 31, 1862, was passed, that he might then have taken on the tremendous scare which now afflicts him.

The gentlemen who passed that act, I imagine, in that Congress knew exactly what was alarming and what was not. They probably understood at that time the exact condition of affairs. The country was then absolutely engaged in war, and these men, with the full knowledge of the facts before them, were putting into the hands of the President of the United States every power that they could safely place there in order to crush out the civil strife then progressing in the country; and in furtherance of that idea among other things they provided that in certain contingencies, wherever the President of the United States in his judgment should approve, or where the public safety required it, he was authorized to seize and take possession of railroads, and they further provided that three commissioners should be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to assess and determine the damages suffered by such seizure. They did not see that there would be any great danger to the Government in that fact, but simply regarded such a proceeding as one of the most effective means of safety and public defense. In pursuance of that policy this railroad got into the hands of the General Government; and the fact stands that way, notwithstanding the strained argument of the gentleman from Ohio upon the unguarded expression of two railroad hands. The idea of capturing a railroad is not embodied in this case. The idea of seizing a railroad in order to use it for the public good, in any way the department commanders might see proper, is just exactly what is in this case.

But what else, Mr. Chairman? The gentleman is alarmed, I say, too late. General Thomas was not alarmed about this case; for after the war was over and this railroad asked that its rights should be considered, he absolutely authorized a commission to inquire as to how much it would take to rehabilitate the road. Was he alarmed? Did he see the terrible danger that the gentleman from Ohio finds? Is it possible that that great soldier and loyal man General Thomas would stand there and have men come up to him asking him to put them upon a basis to settle with the Government of the United States, or rather to go on and rehabilitate the road, when he knew them to be red-handed rebels, and demanding, as the gentleman from Ohio said, to be paid for the ravages of war? The gentleman from Ohio should have been there to get scared then. He should have been there to frighten General Thomas. Was General Thomas, that able officer, a man to be imposed upon? Was that clear-headed general, that active, vigilant officer a man to have given under any circumstances aid to men who were endeavoring to impose upon the Government? Would not he drive such men from his presence, saying you are coming here to attempt to get me to assist you in the rehabilitation and rebuilding of this road when you are not entitled to a cent, when you are in flagrant rebellion against the Government, and in your effort to impose upon the Government you are here first trying to impose upon me?

It is a great pity, I repeat, that the gentleman from Ohio was not there to tell General Thomas what he should get scared at. Why General Meigs, I suppose about as intolerant as any man who ever lived to what he considered an unjust claim, certainly one of the most faithful, vigilant, and just officers with reference to these claims, guarding the Government's interest in every respect where questions were submitted to him, taking for granted many things against a claim which I am not disposed to criticise, but it is singular that when the question of the return of this iron was referred to him, his answer is not that he was frightened, but he says it is impossible to return it; it is impracticable to return the same iron, and that only compensation could be made for it. Is it possible that that officer would not have had his indignation aroused by an attempted imposition upon him or by such an attempted raid upon the Treasury? Is it possible that he would not have had sense enough and sufficient nerve certainly to have said to those men: You are making a most preposterous demand; you are, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio, simply asking us to pay you for your property which was injured by the ravages of war. But he says no such thing.

The clear implication from what he says is, that if they had had the identical iron, and it had been practicable, they would have returned it to the road. But only compensation could be made for it. The fact is, as appears in the record, the reason why the claim was not paid was that the Government itself failed to appoint the commissioners to make the assessment provided by the act of January 31, 1862.

The gentleman says no such claim as this was ever in Congress and he hoped none ever would be. I will tell you why no such claim has been here. It was because in all such cases the Government was not guilty of any laches, but appointed commissioners and assessed the damages, and the amount was paid through the Department. In this case the Government did not do this, and we have no other resource than to come here and say: "You have taken the iron, sold and converted it to your own use, and we ask you to pay for it, as you got it under the act of January 31, 1862, and as that corporation could not commit treason, and, in fact, did not." I reserve the balance of my time, if I have any.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. GEDDES took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2156) for the relief of John Randolph Hamilton, of the State of North Carolina, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 5198) to remove the disabilities of John Taylor Wood, of Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. 5876) for the relief of Dinwiddie B. Phillips.

M'MINNVILLE AND MANCHESTER RAILROAD COMPANY.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If there is to be no further debate I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SMALLS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PERRY] has twenty-five minutes remaining. Does he reserve his time?

Mr. PERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMALLS. I am in favor of this bill, and did intend to take some part in the debate. But I find that the gentlemen from Tennessee know more of the case than I do. I have, therefore, agreed to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] twenty-five minutes of my time, and I will then yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I approach the discussion of this question with no feeling of hostility to the payment of any proper claim against the Government growing out of the seizure of property in the South. On the contrary, the first utterance I made in the House of Representatives was in favor of the passage of a bill which covered a large number of small claims in my own State and a much larger number of claims in Kentucky and Tennessee.

I should be glad if every legal citizen—and in using the word citizen I give it its broadest and most comprehensive meaning and application, bringing within the scope of the word the corporations of the South—I should be glad if all loyal citizens could be paid and indemnified for all of their losses out of which the Government of the United States made anything during the recent war. I agree with the distinguished gentleman from my own State [Mr. GEDDES], the chairman of this committee, that this bill carries within it possibilities of danger that no man can comprehend until he has gone through the details of the claims which must arise out of and upon the structure that the passage of this bill would create and erect.

Now I am actuated in my own course upon this bill by some knowledge of many of the pertinent facts connected with what is now called the seizure of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad by the Government. I deny that in any proper sense that railroad was ever seized by the Government.

Mr. HOUK. That is true; it never was.

Mr. GROSVERNOR. And while it may not be strictly proper to apply the term "captured," there is a greater error in the attempt made by a certain report in connection with the statute of 1862 to put the Government in the attitude of having seized this property for the purposes of the Government pursuant to the terms of that statute.

And right here, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in answer to the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that when he undertakes to stand upon the fact that the Quartermaster-General or any of his deputies appraised this property and made an inventory of it he stands upon a proposition that is without materiality to his side of the case.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to correct the gentleman so far, to say that I did not refer to an appraisement by the Quartermaster's Department, but to the appraisement ordered by General Thomas, the commanding general.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is all one thing, and I am going to show the act of General Thomas in making the order of appraisement was long after all the acts complained of by the complainant had been done and performed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is all true, but the order was made with a view to payment. General Thomas recognized the propriety of payment by the appraisement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman must not put a construction on the conduct of General Thomas which is not authorized by contemporaneous acts and history. The authorities of the War Department ordered officers in the South whenever they took possession of any property wholly regardless of the condition of the mind of the owner, whether he was a rebel or a Union man, to give a receipt for it, and in all proper circumstances to have it appraised. I remember, and will give the gentleman the name of one of his constituents possibly, although I am not cognizant of the lines of his district, and I imagine there never will be a claim presented here on behalf of a gentleman named Childers, who lived in the immediate neighborhood of Murfreesborough, and yet I know as a fact, within my personal knowledge, that as to every part of his property taken the officers gave him receipts for it and made an appraisement of it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If my friend will permit me to suggest, this appraisement was not of that class; but the directors of the road, who were loyal men, called upon General Thomas after the close of the war to make the appraisement, and it was done at their instance, and not in the pro forma way suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand the facts, and what I wish to deduce from them is that that was simply the act of General Thomas in pursuance of the general policy of the Government, in order to show, as a matter of permanent record, the value of the property, leaving every other question to be decided in the future; and that the mere act of making an inventory and appraisement did not, for any purpose, commit the Government to the recognition of a claim for payment. That is what I say. I put myself upon no stronger ground than that, and if my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] attempts to occupy any other ground than that the appraisement was made for this purpose and for no other, then, as a mere matter of fact, he will make a mistake.

In the summer of 1862 the command to which I had the honor to belong marched over this railroad line from Tullahoma to Manchester. There were no cars upon it; the road was dismantled; a large proportion of the ties had been destroyed. Afterward, during the progress of the summer and some time prior to our evacuation of that region, we rebuilt a portion of the road; and the United States Government furnished, out of its supplies at Nashville the iron that was used in the reconstruction of the road between Tullahoma and Manchester. We never did rebuild the road higher up than that, but we sent our troops as far as McMinnville over it.

Mr. HOUK. Can the gentleman state what is the distance from Tullahoma to Manchester?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It depends entirely upon the condition of the road. [Laughter.] I traveled it once when I thought it was 100 miles. I think, however, that in good weather it is about 15 or 16 miles.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the distance is 12 miles.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, we will compromise on 12 miles. We staid at Manchester and occupied that 12 miles of the road, and the spoliations on the balance of it had been done by the rebels. We staid there until McCook's retreat took the Union Army out of that part of the country and concentrated it at Nashville. There we staid until after the battle of Stone River, and the whole of that country along the Nashville and Chattanooga road south from Murfreesborough was in the hands of the Southern confederacy. When we got back the road was still further dismantled. We made our appearance there again about the 2d of July, and found communication totally cut off and the road wholly wrecked. From that time on the rebel cavalry cut the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad upon every possible occasion; and if this bill is to pass, I would like to amend it so as to have a commission appointed to ascertain how much of the amount my amiable friend from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] ought to pay for the destruction which he perpetrated upon it during the time that we were holding a sort of tentative position along the line of that road. [Laughter.] For I never knew him to strike at that railroad that he did not hit it, and I never knew him to leave it without having destroyed from 1 to 5 miles of it, and he understood the business of destruction better than we did, for he destroyed not only the wood but the iron. [Laughter.] When we got back upon that line and thought we had got a final position we were still mistaken, for as late as the fall of 1864, when the Union Army was cooped up inside of Nashville, and Schofield and Cox and Stanley were being driven back from Franklin, the same gentleman, with his coadjutors, struck the main line of that road, and destroyed it in the rear of the command with which I came to Chattanooga to try to rescue the falling fortunes of my countrymen at Nashville. After that, when we again got into position, what did we have?—and here is the turning-point, my friend from Tennessee. The rebel army had destroyed the iron upon the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. We never destroyed a single bar of it. Our purpose was to build up and complete and hold; theirs was to wreck and destroy. They were right from the war standpoint, as we were. We were in possession; it was our line of communication; they struck it and destroyed it. Now, we took from one of these railroads iron enough to make good the waste of war upon the other. We simply placed in position the rails—old, worn rails many of them were—and much of that material was railroad iron which the Government had bought, which the Government had paid for, which the Government had laid down upon the McMinnville road. It was our iron, and we took it and put it over on the Nashville and Chattanooga main line, abandoning the little branch, because we could not hold anything but the main line.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand you to say that the Federal Army placed iron upon the McMinnville and Manchester road only between Tullahoma and Manchester?

Mr. GROSVENOR. So far as I know.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now I beg to call your attention to the fact that the line of road between Tullahoma and McMinnville is 34 miles, and therefore there are 8½ miles there for which there is no charge in this bill. The charge is only for 25½ miles, which would not include any iron placed on the road by the General Government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the gravamen of your claim is that this was iron placed there by the Nashville and Chattanooga road, and that the Government in that indirect way got the value of it. Now I am assuring you that the Government had already placed that same iron, or its equivalent, on the McMinnville and Manchester road, and afterward used the same material on the Nashville and Chattanooga road to make good the ravages of war committed by the Southern confederacy. That is my ground.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not recount the proceedings by which the Nashville and Chattanooga road acquired title to the McMinnville and Manchester branch. That has been already discussed more fully than I could discuss it now. I desire now to call attention to the facts connected with the suit in the United States court, and I desire to set right my friend from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN], if he has not already repented.

Mr. LYMAN. I have not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman says he has not. I desire to set him right upon the subject of the moral effect—not the legal effect but the moral effect—of the failure of the McMinnville Railroad Company to make answer in the action brought by the Government against them on the bond on which this judgment of $90,000 was predicated. I admit that it is not conclusive evidence that a defendant has no counter-claim or set-off that he does not set it up; but it must be admitted that throughout the whole country we punish with some penalty a defendant who allows a judgment to be rendered against him upon a claim against which he has a lawful set-off or counter-claim. In all countries, and certainly in our country, it raises a strong suspicion that the claim alleged is not understood to be one which would stand in a court of justice.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa, as I understood, said that this was not a claim that could be set off against the Government in its suit against the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company. I do not so understand. I desire to refer to the code of the State of Tennessee; and, as I understand the practice in the United States courts upon a question like this, the civil code of the State in which the action is pending in a United States court is the law of the case. I read from page 681 of the code of Tennessee of 1884, and I find by the decisions of the supreme court of that State that the code is older than that:

The defendant may plead by way of set-off or cross-action:

1. Mutual demands held by the defendant against the plaintiff at the time of action brought, and matured when offered in set-off.

2. Any matter arising out of the plaintiff's demand and for which the defendant would be entitled to recover in a cross-action.

3. Any matter growing out of the original consideration of any written instrument, for which the defendant would be entitled to recover in a cross-action.

4. Any equities between the defendant and the original party under whom the plaintiff claims which by law have attached to the demand in the plaintiff's hands, and for which the defendant would be entitled to a recovery against such original party.

Mr. HOUK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio what court the railroad company could have found having jurisdiction of their action against the Government?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Ah, that point would be worthy of the ambitious efforts made at some of the cross-roads justices' offices in my friend's district. He asks me what court the railroad company could have gone into to sue the United States. That does not make any difference. When the United States selected its forum and brought its suit, that was the place where the railroad company could have set up its defense. It is not worth while for my friend to stultify his good history as a lawyer by undertaking to raise such a question as that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I recognize the plausibility of the argument the gentleman is making. I was not counsel in that case, although the court sat at Nashville, where I live. I remember the litigation, however; and since this question has been up I addressed a communication to the gentleman who was counsel in the case, and I asked him the direct question now propounded by the gentleman: why set-off was not pleaded in the action against the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company. His reply by telegram was that, under the law, the claim being for unliquidated damages, it could not be pleaded as a set-off. Such is the law of Tennessee. A claim for unliquidated damages can not be set-off against an ascertained amount.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let us see whether that is the law or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the statement of counsel in the case.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I read from a decision of the supreme court of Tennessee:

Unliquidated damages to be ascertained by a jury can not be set off, but in all cases where indebitatus assumpsit will lie the damages may be set off.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is an action for the value of iron taken by the Government. When I pressed this matter a little the other day some of my friends got into some confusion about the law, and one gentleman insisted that this was a claim for unliquidated damages. Then I said it is a war claim, a claim for the ravages of war. Thereupon another gentleman said it is not a claim for unliquidated damages, but for the unascertained value of goods taken. "Very well, then," said I, "there stands the decision of your court that where the action of indebitatus assumpsit would lie under the common-law practice, that is a subject of set-off or counter-claim in such an action." I ask the gentleman, as a lawyer, would the old common-law declaration of indebitatus assumpsit lie if your statement is true that this is an action to recover the value of a certain number of tons of iron taken and appropriated? He will not deny it.

So my point remains triumphantly sustained that it was within the proper equitable power of that court to have adjudicated this claim and rendered a judgment at least to extinguish the claim made by the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, if not to have given a judgment for the full amount claimed.

Mr. CALDWELL. This was an action by the United States against the railroad company.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. This set-off, you say, could have been pleaded there. Of course you know as a lawyer that the Government can not be sued even by cross-action except by virtue of some statute. Now show the statute by which this could have been pleaded against the Government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Any man who would write such a statute would at once be a proper subject for disbarment from practicing law.

Mr. CALDWELL. Why?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Wherever the Government, or anybody else, asserts a claim, there is no law that prevents a claim of the defendant from being asserted as an answer.

Mr. CALDWELL. Can the Government be sued at all in any form of action except by express provision of statute?

Mr. GROSVENOR. My friend is talking about something which I have conceded. But when the Government seeks to maintain its claim by an action, the Government can be defeated in that action just as though it were a private individual. It has invoked its own processes; it has invoked the operation of its own statutes; it has invoked the procedure of its courts, and may be met by all the defenses with which a private individual could be met.

Mr. HAMMOND. Can the gentleman show a line of law in any book to sustain that proposition?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Can the gentleman show a line of law in any book sustaining his position?

Mr. HAMMOND. I can show a thousand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well, then the gentleman will have an opportunity to do so. The position of the gentleman is that the Government can make a claim against the citizen for money, and the citizen can not answer it by pleading as a set-off a debt which the Government owes him. Let the gentleman sustain that position by any law-book.

Mr. HAMMOND. My proposition is that no sovereign can be sued except by its own consent. In every case where set-off can be pleaded against the Government it is by virtue of a statute which authorizes it. The Government can only be sued in the Court of Claims by virtue of the statute allowing suits in that court.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But in this case the Government selected its own forum, and submitted itself to a court governed by the code of Tennessee; and when it did so, it submitted itself to the operation of the code of Tennessee.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman does not take my point. Whenever one individual sues another in any forum, that other can set up a cross-action. But where a sovereign like our Government is not subject to suit except by its own consent and can only give consent by statute, then it may enforce collection of claims against individuals without liability to any cross-action. The Government may levy on my property for taxation, and I can not resist by any counter-claim. But if I levy on your property by virtue of a judgment and you have a counter-claim, you can set it up, because you and I as individuals are able to sue each other; but the Government can not be sued without its consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has taken the floor for the purpose of asking me a question and holds the floor apparently for the purpose of making a speech, in which he seems to be making a statement about the difficulty of doing things which do not exist. [Laughter.] The sovereignty may take my property, but I may set up a counter-claim. The Government owes me; but when the Government comes into court and says I am indebted to the Government, the Government must meet all the terms of the statute which it has itself invoked. Sovereignty of the Government may be waived by the Government in coming into a State court to sue.

The very doctrine I assert underlies the whole of the controversies where there is conflict of jurisdiction with the Government.

Is it possible my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] has taken such advanced ground in favor of the consolidation of power, and such advanced ground in opposition to the rights of the States, that he holds a citizen may be sued in court and yet the sovereignty of the State can strip the citizen of the right to show he paid the debt for which he is sued? That is a position which is calculated to make the old State-rights men rattle in their coffins.

Mr. HAMMOND. It may be they might rattle in their coffins, but it would depend very much on whether they were lawyers or not. [Laughter.] Now, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will look at the nineteenth volume of Georgia reports he will find there a case, the law reviewed and the authority laid down, that the State, that no sovereign government, can ever be sued except by virtue of its own statutory consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Precisely.

Mr. HAMMOND. And particularly that every one of the restrictions placed on the privilege of suing must be complied with.

A set-off is but a cross-action. The test of the case read by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was that wherever you could maintain indebitatus assumpsit you could plead set-off. But you can not maintain the action of indebitatus assumpsit against the United States anywhere except in the Court of Claims under the statute which organizes that court and in other cases according to the terms of permissive statutes, as on official bonds and the like or under the post-office laws. These statutes expressly authorize a person to set up claims in cutting down a claim of the Government against him. In other words, it is the perfect right of every State of the United States, of the United States, and of every government in the world, that you can not sue it originally or by cross-action without its consent by statute and according to the statutory consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have yielded to these gentlemen for the purpose of asking me questions, and it has resulted in the whole of my time being occupied by them.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman a question if he will allow me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time yielded the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is that the way gentlemen on the other side do? I have yielded my time to them to ask questions, and now when it comes to my time to reply there is no time left for that purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. I believe I did not consume all of the time yielded to me by the gentleman from South Corolina [Mr. PERRY], and whatever I have left of that time I will willingly yield to the gentleman from Ohio to continue his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMALLS] took the floor and yielded thirty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], who took the floor. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] entered the Hall, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMALLS] yielded to him twenty-five minutes, and that twenty-five minutes the gentleman from Ohio has occupied. The Chair therefore now recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] to occupy the half-hour which has been yielded to him.

Mr. CALDWELL. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has been taken up by interruptions from this side, and it is only fair, as we have consumed most of his time, further time should be yielded to him if possible from this side.

Mr. PERRY. If I have any time remaining I will yield it to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HOUK. I will allow the gentleman to continue his remarks, but I do not wish it taken out of my time. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Ten minutes is all I want.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman is allowed to proceed, I hope he will speak to the facts of the case, which he has not done heretofore, and let the law alone, as it seems to burn him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Ohio will stand on his position, and will not import anybody into the case to help him out, as the gentleman from Tennessee did. He will not be helped out by bringing in somebody else. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not yield. The trouble about these gentlemen is they take up all my time with their questions, and in that way make my speech for me, and I now prefer to hold the floor and make my own. [Laughter.]

I maintain, sir, that my proposition of law is sound to-day. But I will turn from it, simply claiming the right when Judge HAMMOND comes back again to show him precisely what his supreme court did decide, as reported in 19 Georgia; and I will make the further proposition, no matter what the law may be, no matter what technical construction may have been likely to grow out of a claim like this, the gentlemen can not afford to deny that they have at least prejudiced their claims by their own actions; their long silence, their consenting to a judgment, their failure to appeal to the executive branch of the Government, failure to come to Washington and see the Attorney-General and take advantage of that boasted sovereignty of the United States, which the gentleman from Georgia says has now obliterated all power of the State courts and all rights of the citizens, which has become all dominant, all pervading, breaking down the rights of the citizens everywhere, all of which has grown out of a simple construction of the sovereign power vested in the United States. I say their failure to come is a circumstance against the case. They did not come here; they did not understand that they had any claim; they did not understand that there was a court of law to which they could appeal; they did not come to a court of conscience; they did not enter the forum of equity, nor did they come here to treat with the Government, and say you are asking us to pay you $90,000 when you owe us $240,000. I do not say that this is conclusive of the right of these parties, but I do say that it is a powerful suggestion against the equity—the stale equity—of the claim asserted here twenty-two years after the cause of action had accrued.

A claim of this kind now set up here in any one of the States of this country would long ago have been barred; a title to real property would have accrued; the statute of limitations would intervene; for it is a claim so stale that it bears upon its face the suggestion of doubt at least as to its equity.

Now, if our friends over there desire to pay this claim I have no objection; I only want them to do it with their eyes wide open. I want it to be understood that it is done on the ground that corporations in the South were incapable of bringing down upon their heads the inhibition of the statute against paying the claims of disloyal citizens; and that all a man had to do there was to take his certificate of stock in a rolling-mill or a foundry and he was safe, no mattter what he did.

Then he could make cannon and bayonets, or make powder to shoot down the Union soldiers who came down to the South, and if he could only show that the foundry, the armory, or the arsenal was the property of a corporation, the members of it could shield themselves behind their certificates of stock and go unwhipped under the statute forbidding the payment of this class of claims. I want them to pay it on the further ground that the Government of the United States is now called on to divide up the responsibility with the South for the destruction of their private property; that wherever property was seized or destroyed, no matter by what party, the Government of the United States shall undertake to pay the whole claim, and that it shall look to the Southern confederacy to contribute its proportion for the wrong which they themselves did. That is the position I plant myself upon. I am opposed to the payment of this claim for the reason that it is, first, a claim shrouded in mystery as to its details, and, second, a claim resting upon State equity; and when its nature and its history are developed it stands in the attitude of a Southern war claim, sugar-coated by certain circumstances that the people of this country can not draw the line upon.

I reserve the remainder of my time, or five minutes of it, until I can get hold of the Georgia case.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is a pity the gentleman did not get somebody to help him.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I beg the House to let us proceed in the consideration of this claim with one fact constantly prominent in our minds: Every man on this floor knows, whatever gentlemen on the other side may have felt, that during the time of the entire war, from the hour it was proclaimed until the close with the surrender of Lee at Appomattox, the entire war from the beginning to the end of it was fought on the theory that all the States were in the Union. I call your attention to the fact now, for I shall have occasion to use it a little further on. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] and others, and I include also my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], have discussed this bill as though Jefferson Davis was standing at the door of this House of Representatives demanding pay for the negroes taken from him by Benjamin F. Butler and put to work upon the fortifications on the Mississippi.

My friend from Ohio on the left [Mr. GEDDES] especially managed the other day to work himself up into a perfect frenzy. He succeeded in reorganizing the armies, placed them confronting each other in battle array, mounted, booted and spurred, and made as gallant a charge on the rebel brigadiers and their constituents as was ever made during the rebellion upon the field.

I had thought, Mr. Chairman, that the war was ended. I had thought that nobody attempted to arouse the passions and prejudices in debate either in Congress or out of it except occasionally we Southern radicals. But I find it takes a Northern Democrat to do absolute justice to the subject, and become a bloody-shirt rampanter. As I listened to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] the other day making his earnest and eloquent appeal for the purpose of arousing the patriotic sentiment on this side of the House, and perhaps in his own party, for the purpose of defeating a claim which I will show in the progress of what I have to say has no more to do with the rebellion than the gentleman drawing his salary at the Sergeant-at-Arms's room—as I listened to him I could not help but ponder and think to myself, putting this and that together, what queer people some of these Northern Democrats are. They are very singular. Why, about election-time I will venture to say the gentleman from Ohio would hug the rebels to his bosom. And he would come here and vote for almost anything to keep the Democratic party in power in the South. But just let a Southern corporation, composed as it was of Union men, its president being a man than whom never a better Union man drew breath—let a Southern corporation composed largely of Union men come here, and then the gentleman from Ohio is ready to raise the bloody shirt in order to drive men from voting to do justice and pay an honest debt.

I am glad the gentleman from Ohio who has last spoken [Mr. GROSVENOR] made the admission he did. All the argument against this bill thus far, until the argument of that gentleman, has proceeded upon the idea that this railroad was captured by the Federal Army. All the defense that has been set up against this debt is that it was a destruction; that it was a devastation of war; that it was one of the rights inhering in a military movement to take this property. Why, sir, do gentlemen know what they are talking about? Where is the law-book, where is the judge, where is the lawyer that will lay it down as a proposition of law that a military commander has a right to take private property, except in the midst of conflict and while the war is flagrant and raging at the time? How was it in this case? What is the distinction between this and other Southern railroads? I say, and I have waded through this entire record for the purpose of seeing what the facts are, there is not another railroad case in the whole South parallel with this or like it.

What is the difference between this road and the Chattanooga road? And why should you pay the one and not the other? The Chattanooga road was being operated and used by the rebels. We had to fight for every inch of the road of which we afterward took possession. There was not a yard of it but flagrant, actual, persistent war was waged in order to recover it.

Here comes in this principle of law that in time of war the law is silent, and the military commander has the right to do what he pleases. In seizing the Chattanooga road or any other road like it, it was not only the right but the duty of the military to take it for the use of the Army. What are the facts about this road? Was this road being used by the rebels at the time this property was taken? Not a bit of it. Could this road be a wicked instrument in the hands of the rebellion? Not a bit of it.

Why, sir, originally it was 34 miles long—running where? Running from Tullahoma up into the gorges of the mountains. It had started but had not got anywhere. Perhaps in the beginning they transported a hog or a beef or a company of soldiers over it. That is probably true. But does that justify the Government seizing this property afterward, when war had ceased in that community, and appropriating, selling it, and taking the money for it? Why, sir, what are the facts? And I vouch for every fact I state being found in this record. When we approached Tennessee—and when I say "we" I mean the Union forces—the Nashville and Chattanooga road was still operating, and as we gathered ready to march on the line of that road the rebel army seized, took, stole, and carried away every particle of the rolling-stock on that road and left nothing but the road-bed, taking the iron rails, chairs, and other property.

I invite to this question the attention of the distinguished lawyers of this House who like to show their wit and legal acumen. I say if war was actually existing on the line of the road at that time the Government would have had the right to take the iron without compensation. But what were the facts? Our forces had driven the rebels out of the country from ten to twelve months before. At the time this property was taken there was not an organized force within 100 or 150 miles of the place. Society all over that country was as tranquil as it was possible for it to be after the civil convulsion through which we had passed. Courts were then being reorganized under acting Governor Johnson. Peace, except for the doings, it may be, of a robber or a straggler here and there, prevailed throughout all that region. There was no flagrant war; there was no enemy. How could there be a war authorizing a commander to take private property unless there was more than one army there? I never heard of one army carrying on a war by itself.

I come now to another question, Mr. Chairman. The military authorities that took this property never thought of its being an act of war. I invite the attention of this House to this great fact.

Not a single man, from General Thomas or General Rosecrans down through all their subordinates, ever raised the point that it was taken as an act of war. I may as well in this connection try to show what this claim is for.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman give way for a moment?

Mr. HOUK. I can not give way. You have all had your say.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understand that you are stating the record.

Mr. HOUK. You have all made your speeches, and I can not yield. I am making HOUK'S speech now. [Laughter.]

I state that there was not a single Government officer who ever thought about claiming that this was an act of war, done under the authority vested in the military commander by the principle that where actual hostilities exist the will of the military comimander is supreme. I say that no officer of the Army or of the Government ever took that ground. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is this claim for? Here [illustrating] is the Nashville and Chattanooga road; here is the McMinnville and Manchester road, running off for 36 miles, from 34 of which the Government of the United States, through its military officers, took the iron rails, bridges, and spikes, burned all the buildings (we ask nothing for that), and used the iron taken from that road to repair the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and afterward, instead of turning it back, as somebody has stated, to the McMinnville and Manchester road, the Government never did return one pound of it, but sold it to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad at $120 per ton, as the record shows.

When the officers of the McMinnville and Manchester road made application to General Thomas to restore this railroad to them, what did he say and do? There is a great big thought in this; it is a powerful argument to enforce this claim. What did General Thomas say when they went to him and made that application? They said to him: "You have taken the iron off our road, and we want you to restore it to us." When they made that application, did General Thomas reply: "Why, we captured that property; we took possession of it under the power vested in the military authorities in time of war?" He said nothing of the sort, but he proceeded at once to instruct his quartermasters and deputy quartermasters to do what? To go on and ascertain the value of the property, not only how much iron there was and the value of it, not only what it would take to reconstruct the buildings that were burned (for which no pay is asked), but also to ascertain what it would cost to place the road in the condition in which it was when the iron was taken from it.

I have not time to read the record, but I have it here, and it shows that General Thomas gave such instructions to his officers, and that they proceeded to make that investigation. You will find the opinion of the engineer in the record—I speak from the record; I do not speak outside of the record—you will find the report of this engineer saying that they have not got the iron on hand to place the road in that condition, and that therefore they can not comply with that part of the order. The suggestion runs through every order and every conversation and every deposition that was ever taken in relation to this matter that the Government felt itself bound to place that road in the condition in which it found it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when was this? My friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is not aged; you would think him a young man if it were not for his hair [laughter]; but I think he is very forgetful, because he has spoken here of events as happening in 1864 that really took place in 1863—the use of that road by the rebels in connection with the battles along that line.

But it was in the latter part of 1864 that this iron was taken from the one road and placed on the other. Now, I do not want to appeal to any man's party prejudice or passions; but I do appeal to every man, Republican or Democrat, to rise above party and vote for honesty and right. Gentlemen have taken occasion to use by way of illustration cases coming under the 4th of July act. Now, what is the difference between such cases and this? In one case you take corn out of a man's field; in another case you take this iron. After we occupied the insurrectionary country did we not send out files of soldiers with trains of wagons to go into men's fields and take their corn, and did we not pass a law to pay men for property taken in that way when they were proved to be loyal? Do we not vote here all the time to do that? Now, in this case you send out a file of soldiers to take up this property in the peaceable possession of its owners and appropriate it, and afterward you sell it and get the money. Is not the principle precisely the same?

Mr. GEDDES. The gentleman will remember that I allowed him to interrupt me several times——

Mr. HOUK. I do not so understand.

Mr. GEDDES. And I would like to make a single remark.

Mr. HOUK. Very well, if it is brief.

Mr. GEDDES. I want to call the attention of the House——

Mr. HOUK. I did not give way for the gentleman to make a speech

Mr. GEDDES. Well, I will ask a question. The gentleman will remember I challenged every man on our side of the House to show me from the record one word or sentence to prove that the Government ever sold any portion of this property to any one or ever received a penny for it. None of them could produce such proof. The gentleman now repeats that assertion, and I repeat my challenge for him to show any such thing in the record.

Mr. HOUK. I have not time to read; but I say if it is not shown in this record that one hundred and seventy-two pieces of this iron were afterward identified, I will agree to go out and be hung by the meanest Democrat you have got. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEDDES. I will not be your executioner.

Mr. HOUK. You might officiate at the funeral.

Mr. GEDDES. If the gentleman will read from the record I will give him the page.

Mr. HOUK. I know the page, but I have not time to read. I make the assertion on my honor (and if any gentleman disputes it, let him come up here and take this record and read it—my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] can point out the page)—that one hundred and seventy-two pieces of this iron were identified by two witnesses.

The learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who I presume in Ohio is a good lawyer but he would not be in my State if he did not make stronger points than he did to-day, says it is an absurdity to talk about this property having been taken under the act of July 1, 1862. Let me call the attention of every lawyer in the House to the fact that at the time of these occurrences, the confederate army having gone, peace prevailing so far as that country was concerned, it was back in the Union on the ground that we were all fighting and claiming and clamoring for; and there being no active hostilities there, there being but one army in the vicinity, substantial peace prevailing, there were two ways by which that property could be taken. One was to seize it under the act of 1862; the other was, in imitation of others, to go and pillage it, to go and plunder people after they had been restored under the flag of their country. Take either horn of the dilemma you please, I say this property ought to be paid for.

For fear that there may be some misapprehension I wish to say (as there has been so much talk thrown in about "rebels") that I know a part of the directory of that road were loyal; I personally know its president was loyal; and I know, and this record shows it, that General Thomas treated with them on that basis. Even though they had been the vilest rebels that ever went unhung, being a corporation, the question of loyalty could not enter into the case. The argument of the gentleman of Ohio would make churches "rebels" and schools "rebels," and I believe some gentlemen do go that far. I have even had it insinuated that because I happened to live in a rebel State I was a rebel. I wish you were all rebels just like me, you would stand a better chance of glory than you do. [Laughter.]

Now I desire to read from the record of General Thomas. Hear what General Thomas says about it. He does not talk of capture, confiscation, and the rights of war. Oh, no. He says:

Respectfully forwarded to Mr. Horace Harrison and others for their information. The original papers have been referred to the Quartermaster-General, and the recommendation that the articles taken from the road be returned.
By command of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas.

J. L. DONALDSON,
Brevet Maj. Gen., and Chief A. Q. M. M. D. T.

They did not return them, but sold them and got pay for them. And all we ask here is that what the Government got for them shall be returned to this company. Now the original articles have been referred to.

Mr. GEDDES. Further on it shows they were returned.

Mr. HOUK. Why do you not show it?

Mr. GEDDES. You read it all through and you know it.

Mr. HOUK. I have not been able to find any such record there. That is a question which can be settled by everybody.

Let me read this order:

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE,
UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROADS,
Nashville, July 20, 1865.

Respectfully returned to Bvt. Maj. Gen. J. L. Donaldson, chief quartermaster Military Division of the Tennessee, calling attention to the inclosed report and estimates of A. Hibard, chief engineer of construction and repairs, who estimates the cost of repairing and putting the road in running order at $346,880, but to restore the property removed and destroyed by military order will probably cost not to exceed $285,000. No trestle-works or culverts were destroyed by the United States forces. No cross-ties were removed, and only 300 feet of bridges burned by order of the United States officers.

W. J. STEVENS,
General Superintendent.

Then follows General Thomas's order, which I have read.

Now we come down to General McCallum. He repeats another fact which I had nearly forgotten, and it is also repeated by nearly every one of these officers, that they make application under the act of 1862. General McCallum and General Meigs recognize it was not robbery, but seizure in the sense of the act of 1862.

Now, there are a few things in this record which ought to be known to every man on this floor. I am sorry it has not been printed and distributed in the House so that every man could read it and see them for himself. I spent sleepless nights over it to discover what were the facts set up by the gentleman from Ohio, and I was unable to discover them. Every Government officer who had anything to do with this transaction recognized this property as taken under the act of July, 1862. The act of 1862 was not complied with, and what do we do now? Simply ask the Government to do us justice. Suppose it had been in court and we had failed to plead a set-off and the law recognized a set-off, which I deny; but suppose the lawyer neglected it, where is the place to invoke justice better than here; and what right have we to say: "Here, you did not get the right lawyer; your lawyer ought to have pleaded a set-off and he forgot to do so?" The difficulty is, the company did not have a lawyer like the gentleman from Ohio, or else they would have been all right, would they not? [Laughter.]

Now, there never was a claim before this House more just and equitable, never a claim before this House which deserved to be recognized quicker than this one.

The argument of the gentleman that the material was taken from the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and therefore the Government had the right to take this property to make up that which was lost, is a strange one. Where on earth did he learn such law? I never read it in the Bible or in Blackstone or in Story or in any other book, that because the first party did wrong you may take the property of a second party out of which to repair that wrong, and let the wrongdoer (which was the United States in this case) escape!

I expected to get an hour on this subject, and therefore have not covered all the ground I intended, because it was impossible in the short period to which I have been limited.

And now, in conclusion, I have only to make this further remark. I am not here as a friend of corporations, and certainly nobody will accuse me of being partial to rebels. But, sir, I am here to do right, as I see the right when called upon to do it. Any business man who should conduct himself in a precisely similar transaction to this as the Government has done would cover himself all over with infamy, so far as the business men of this country are concerned.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has twenty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. This is an important question, and we ought to consider it calmly and dispassionately. If, as I said in my remarks before, the Government owes the McMinnville and Manchester road or anybody else it should pay its debt. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] who has just taken his seat says the record shows in this case the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company is here asking this bill be passed. I defy the gentleman to turn to it and show me where the road he has pleaded for asks any relief at the hands of Congress.

Gentlemen on the other side argue very ingeniously by making this plea, which they put upon the ground that the McMinnville and Manchester road have this right of recovery on their own demand, when as a matter of fact the McMinnville and Manchester road are not asking a dollar at the hands of this Congress.

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will not, because you would not permit us, and you have the close of this argument.

Mr. HOUK. I did permit you to interrupt me.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Well, what is it?

Mr. HOUK. I wanted to say that I had expected to occupy an hour in the argument of this case, but that time was very much reduced, as the gentleman knows. I had a note of that point and I want to show that the facts are these——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Well, now, I can not afford to yield to the gentleman to make a speech. It is the gentleman's own fault if he did not state the facts.

Mr. HOUK. If the gentleman would state the facts as they are I would not ask leave.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That is just what I expect to do.

Mr. HOUK. That is just what you have not done.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will state the facts in the case, just what the gentleman has not done.

Mr. HOUK. That is not true.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Well, we will have no question about that. I suppose the gentleman from Tennessee is honestly mistaken, and he is too small a man for me to have a personal conflict with. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. The "gentleman from Tennessee" can take care of himself.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I say, Mr. Chairman, and I reiterate it now, that this record from the beginning to the end shows one state of facts, and that is that in 1870, or about that time, this road applied to General Thomas to have that railroad made good; and that General Thomas had his quartermaster to estimate what it would cost; that the quartermaster and the Government refused to make it good, because they said they held it as captured property; and if you will turn to page 37 and page 87 of that record you will find it there. Again, afterward the road was sold under authority of the government of the State of Tennessee, whereby it was sought to rob the General Government of her lien for rolling-stock and iron, and since that time the McMinnville and Manchester road has been dissolved, and they have never asked either in or out of Congress to make this claim.

Mr. HOUK. Now tell it all; tell all the facts.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will, sir, if you will keep your seat; I can not talk while you are on end. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. All I want is that you will tell the whole story; do not tell a part, but tell it all.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I say the further fact that the road was sold under decree of the State court of Tennessee, whereby they sought to rob the General Government of her loss for iron and rolling-stock; and that that act of the State of Tennessee, when they sold that road, compelled this road to make all legal defense that they had to the claim of the Government upon it. When they sold the road to the Charleston road they bound themselves to stand between them and the General Government, and provided they would interpose every legal defense they had to this claim, and bound them up by the law requiring them to make all legal and equitable defense to the ninety-eight-thousand-dollar demand of the General Government. Did you find that in the record?

Mr. HOUK. Did they not propose to pay that $98,000 to the General Government, provided the Government would settle its indebtedness to the road? Did they not agree to let that be deducted from the amount due to the road by the General Government? Does the gentleman know what became of that road? Does he know who owns it, with all of its rights and franchises?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Where is the McMinnville and Manchester road now? It has gone where "Ward's ducks" went, I suppose, and you are here asking the General Government to pay you over $240,000 to a defunct corporation which has no legal existence whatever.

Mr. HOUK. Does the gentleman from Indiana state all the facts?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That is just what I am doing.

Mr. HOUK. Does not the gentleman know the road-bed and all the franchises that the McMinnville and Manchester road had were sold to the Memphis and Charleston road first, and that subsequently, under a decree of the court, its franchises, rights, and assets were sold to the Nashville and Chattanooga road, which assets embraced this claim now set up here? The gentleman does not state all the facts.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Let me answer this first, and I shall refer to the record to show the state of facts to which I am referring. That record shows that from the time that road came into the possession of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, under the decree, they refused utterly to carry out the contract with the Government for carrying the mails. They refused on the ground that they bought nothing but the naked road, and whatever there was left of the rolling-stock and iron. They did not agree that they had bought any part of any contract previously existing, and set up no claim against the Government.

Mr. STRUBLE. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if he considers this a calm consideration of the question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I hope, since that comes from a friend of mine, that he is asking a pertinent question. I do not know what you mean by a "cawm" consideration of the question. If you say "calm" consideration, I might understand you. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. It was suggested to me to ask the question in that form; but if the gentleman does not desire to answer it I will withdraw it. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I hope these interruptions will not come out of my time. I say this record shows (instead of showing what the gentleman from Tennessee says it shows) that this corporation bought that road with all of its rights. I say the record shows us that they bought it and whatever rights and equities it had; but they acknowledged none of the liabilities of the McMinnville and Manchester road. And did they refuse to carry the mail?

Mr. HOUK. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. The gentleman says he does not know. The gentleman has made a speech without knowing a scintilla of the facts in that record—not one of them. He has made a speech that would do justice—I would say without wishing to create any feeling—that would do justice to a man arguing a case before some justice of the peace at some cross-road.

Mr. HOUK. That is where you passed as a lawyer, no doubt.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. This record shows a further state of facts. It shows that this company bought the road as it was then, that it turned the road over as it was at the time, and the Government said, "We will turn these roads over, leaving you to settle these disputed questions yourselves." And in place of the McMinnville road thinking it held a claim against the Government it sued in the State courts of Tennessee the Chattanooga road. They settled it between themselves, not looking to the Government. After this sale it went into the hands of another corporation. That corporation, which did not pay a dollar for it, comes in now and seeks to collect this claim, and invokes the aid of the gentleman from Tennessee to help through a claim for a corporation that never paid a dollar for it in the world; and this record does not show that it did.

Mr. HOUK. That is not the fact.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] and the other gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] what did the Chattanoga road pay for the Manchester road? They did not answer the question. They are as dumb as oysters on that point, and they do not propose to tell. I presume it was less than $100,000, because I see by the record they claim the State should deposit $125,000 of State bonds as a guarantee to them. Suppose they bought it for $125,000, they got $20,000 of rolling-stock the Government had there, and $46,000 of iron the Government had there—they got 27 miles of railroad for $125,000. And now they come and ask the Government to pay $268,000 for what they could not have paid over $125,000 for, and yet leave them the property. That is the condition of this case.

I ask the gentleman from Tennessee as he closes this argument to show by this record by what right the Chattanooga and Nashville road can make this claim. There is not a word in that record to show they ever bought this road. If the decree was set out, if the execution was there, if the return of the officer was there, and a deed from the marshal or sheriff to the Chattanooga road, for this line of road, we might have some data from which to form an estimate. But I say if we owe a single solitary dollar on that road we owe it to the McMinnville and Manchester road, to whom this bill does not give a dollar. And if you acknowledge your liability by the passage of this bill as soon as this is paid they can recover the $246,000, and you have no defense to it, unless these people bring an assignment here of some kind.

If you pass this bill you can not prevent the McMinnville and Manchester road from afterward asking the Government to pay for this property. It amounts to asking the Government to pay a debt to a party when the third party concerned is not in court. That will be the result of this whole transaction. We will have admitted that we owe the debt, and we will have paid it to the Chattanooga and Nashville road without any request upon the part of the McMinnville road and without any agreement on their part that the payment of this shall be a satisfaction of the debt. And I say that this record from the beginning to the end does not disclose that they have got any title to the road at all. All that we can do is to rely upon the very fertile imagination of the gentleman from Tennessee as to what ought to be in that record.

Now I want to say to our Democratic friends that there is one other consideration that makes me oppose this bill very strenuously. Two years ago in the campaign my constituents were told from every stump that there was $8.75 in the Treasury for each one of them and that they should have it if the Democratic party was successful. But if you vote the money in the Treasury away to these corporations I will never get done answering questions when I get home from my people why they have not got their money. [Laughter.] You ought to be true to them. I oppose this because in this record—and I, like the gentleman from Tennessee, have spent sleepless nights over it—I can not find an affirmative proposition there as the gentleman stated it on the other side. I could read to you, but I have not got time, paragraph after paragraph where the Government claimed they held this as captured property and where they refused to turn it over.

How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I yield it to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES].

Mr. GEDDES. It was not my purpose to say a word in addition to what I have already submitted to the House in regard to this case, and I would only now endeavor to emphasize two propositions. One of them was evidently regarded as important by the friends of this measure on both sides of the House. They started out on our side of the House to make it appear this was an equitable and a fair claim, by asserting that the record discloses the fact that the iron for which they now sought payment was put down on the Nashville and Chattanooga road and the Nashville and Chattanooga road charged with it, and that they entered into an obligation to pay for it, and that that enters into the obligation now resting upon that road. I regarded that as important. It would be an equitable consideration. I am not at liberty to say how it would overcome my judgment as I now stand. I followed with anxiety the gentlemen in their statements. I challenged the first one, the second one, and the third one that made the assertion a week ago, and they have had one whole week to spend sleepless nights with my friend here over the record to discover that matter.

But he saw proper to come here and boldly repeat the declaration in the face of the record without referring to a word or a line in it. I extracted from that record this morning what I think will clearly show that this was not so. The Quartermaster-General, in speaking of the action of the Government in that matter, says:

> The iron taken from the road was laid upon the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and I am informed that a suit is pending against that company with a prospect, it is said, that a judgment will be rendered in favor of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company.

After the war and after all these acts, the McMinnville and Manchester Company sued the Nashville and Chattanooga Company (they are now in combination) to seek to recover this money, and what does this officer say about it?

> In restoring the road to the companies the United States did not undertake to settle questions of property between the different companies or to give title thereto, but left that matter to be settled by the judicial tribunals.

That is, "Recover, if you can, of the Nashville and Chattanooga road; we settled no question of property; we gave no title thereto; do the best you can; so far as the Government is concerned, it was ravages of war, nothing more, and we do not interfere as between you." There is the declaration, plainly and clearly made, that the title to the property taken from the one road during the war and placed upon the other during the war was left just where the Government found it—that the Government left all legal questions to the courts. Now, that is the record that is staring my friends here in the face, and staring in the face the good, earnest gentleman on the other side of the House [Mr. HOUK]. I had the honor to serve as a subordinate under that gentleman when he was chairman of the Committee on War Claims, and if this claim had been presented to that committee I know what his judgment then was in regard to similar claims. But the presentation of this claim was left to this Congress, when I have the responsibility of the action of that committee; it was not presented under my good friend on the other side when he was chairman of the committee. Now, all I ask is that our friends on this side of the House shall not do what they on the other side were ashamed to do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to supplement the remarks I have already made by putting into the RECORD the authorities relied upon by those who support the proposition that in the State courts of Tennessee the claim of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company would not have been a proper subject of set-off against the claim of the Government, and it may be that it is better for me to admit now that in so far as that railroad company might have sought a judgment against the Government, the authorities are that it could not have maintained its position. In 11 Howard, page 290 (following a subdivision of the syllabus, is the following words: "To sanction judgment under a plea of set-off would virtually be allowing the United States to be sued, which the laws do not allow"), the court used this language:

> To permit a demand in set-off against the Government to be proceeded on to judgment against it would be equivalent to the permission of a suit to be prosecuted against it. And however this may be tolerated between individuals by a species of reconvention, when demands in set-off are sought to be recovered, it could not be as against the Government, except by a mere evasion, and must be as useless in the end as it would be derogatory to judicial fairness. A set-off or reconvention is often to be treated as a new suit by the defendant, and the pleadings and judgment are to be made to correspond. (See Louisiana Code of Practice, 374, section 371-377.) In Perry vs. Gerbeau and wife, 5 Martin, Revised Statutes, 18, the court say, "The claim set up in the answer was one in reconvention, and too general. Such demands should have the same certainty as a petition."

It would present, also, the inconsistency of the officers of a government issuing precepts against it, and seizing and selling the property under their own charge and protection. Or it would present the other alternative, of entering a judgment against a party which it could not enforce by execution, and which none of its officers had been authorized to discharge.

The court there say that it would be folly to render judgment against the Government when they would not collect the judgment. Now, let it be borne in mind that my position does not necessarily involve the proposition that there might have been a judgment in the Tennessee court for the balance over and above the claim of the Government, but I call upon gentlemen on the other side to produce any authority that will justify them in saying that the presentation by plea in the Tennessee court of a greater claim against the Government would not have been a sufficient answer to the claim of the Government for judgment there. This authority, which seems to be the strongest one within my reach, goes only to the proposition that the set-off should not be allowed to be proceeded upon to judgment against the Government.

Mr. HAMMOND. Because the United States could not be sued.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I leave that proposition where the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] has already placed it.

But I desire to put into the record another authority which sustains the proposition I make, so far as the equity of it is concerned. I read from 9 Cranch, page 235:

The act of Congress providing for the settlement of accounts between the United States and the receivers of public moneys is so explicit as to preclude every difficulty in deciding on the first question. The third section of the law provides that where a suit shall be instituted against any person indebted to the United States, the court shall grant judgment at the return term, on motion, unless the defendant shall in open court make oath or affirmation that he is equitably entitled to credits, which had been, previous to the commencement of the suit, submitted to the consideration of the accounting officers of the Treasury and rejected, specifying each particular claim so rejected in the affidavit. The next section declares that in suits between the United States and individuals no claim for a credit shall be admitted upon trial but such as shall appear to have been submitted to the accounting officers of the Treasury for their examination and by them disallowed, unless it shall appear that the defendant at the time of trial is in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure, and that he was prevented from exhibiting a claim for such credit by absence from the United States, or by some unavoidable accident.

I think this settles the proposition that these defendants when this demand was made against them might have made their claim to the accounting officers of the Treasury, and then when it was disallowed they could have set it up as a set-off in the court in Tennessee to the extent of defeating the claim of the Government for judgment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, I have not attempted to argue the merits of this case. But in the debate to-day I challenged a statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] by a declaration that according to the law as settled everywhere a sovereign can not be sued without its statutory consent. The gentleman after he finished speaking asked me to cite him a case. I cited the one in 9 Cranch, the one in 11 Howard, and another in 103 United States Reports. As to the State authorities, I was not extravagant when I said I could cite a thousand lines of them. That is all I have to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the Committee of the Whole by further discussion of the questions arising on this bill. Last Friday I presented very fully what I thought was a fair and clear statement of the facts involved. If I were disposed to occupy time now for the purpose of running over and answering all the arguments made by my friend from Indiana and others who have opposed the bill, I think I could do so in detail to the satisfaction of every member. I can not undertake to answer all the questions propounded by the gentleman from Indiana, because they have no relevancy or connection with the matters involved in this controversy. The circumstances of the case are simply these: The Government took this iron from the McMinnville and Manchester road; it took it when there was not an armed confederate soldier within 100 miles of that place. The officers of the United States laid this iron upon the Nashville and Chattanooga road and used it there a few months, until the war closed; they then sold to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company more than $1,500,000 worth of property; and included in that sale, as we assert, was the very iron which had been taken from the McMinnville and Manchester road and laid down on the Nashville and Chattanooga road.

These facts appearing to the subcommittee of the Committee on War Claims which investigated this case, the subcommittee assumed, as did the Committee on the Judiciary of the Forty-eighth Congress, that the Government having taken this iron from the McMinnville and Manchester road, having placed it upon the Nashville and Chattanooga road, and then having sold it to the latter road, the Government ought to account to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company for the iron.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] says that the facts do not so appear in the record. Mr. Chairman, we did not know until he spoke in this debate that that question would be controverted. If we had anticipated such a thing I could have piled testimony upon testimony until the most skeptical man would never have questioned the matter. But the gentleman did not give me notice that he would make that objection to this bill. It had passed our committee; it had been on the Calendar for two long months; and I did not know until last Friday that this objection would be raised by the opponents of the bill.

Mr. GEDDES. Now, I think my colleague on the committee, as he has referred to the action of the committee, ought to state the additional fact as to how the bill passed the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; it passed, as I remember, by a unanimous vote, except that the chairman voted against it, saying that he did not understand it. I do not want to state what occurred in the committee, but the gentleman has challenged me to do so.

Mr. GEDDES. I make no objection to the statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say that the gentleman voted against the bill there, with the statement that he did not understand it.

Mr. GEDDES. Was not this the fact——

A MEMBER. How did the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] vote?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know how the gentleman from Indiana voted. I do not want to divulge these matters which occurred in committee——

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a point of order, that the gentleman has no right to disclose what occurred in committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I take it all back.

I have in my hand a telegram from the president of the Nashville and Chattanooga road. I say I was surprised at the formal objection raised here; and I sent to this gentleman a copy of the RECORD containing the debate last Friday. His telegram in reply says:

On page 3371, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mr. BUCHANAN wishes to know why the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad should be paid for the iron which was taken from the McMinnville road and laid upon our track, seeming to think that we want pay for that which we have already received. The answer to this is that the United States laid the iron belonging to the McMinnville road upon our track and then sold to us at the close of the war this iron.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware this is not evidence——

A MEMBER. From what does the gentleman read?

Mr. RICHARDSON. A telegram sent to me by John W. Thomas, president and general manager of the Nashville and Chattanooga road.

The gentleman from Indiana says the Nashville and Chattanooga road is not here asking for relief. That is true. This bill proposes to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester road. The conclusion reached by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN], and myself—a conclusion which I think the record abundantly sustains—was that this iron having been used as I have stated, the Government ought to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester road. But it does appear that the McMinnville and Manchester road expresses its entire willingness to take, in settlement of this indebtedness, the obligation of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad to the General Government.

Now, I say you have no right to complain of that. If the McMinnville and Manchester road, the beneficiary in this bill, is willing to take the obligation of the Nashville and Chattanooga road to the Government in part payment for the very iron out of which this indebtedness arises, we say no one has the right to complain.

I say, in conclusion, the proof shows this very iron sold by the Government to the Nashville and Chattanooga road in 1865 was sold at $125 per ton, and the statement upon which the calculation was made here and the allowance to the McMinnville and Manchester road is at the rate of $85 a ton.

The Judiciary Committee of the last House, having investigated this claim, reported it unanimously, as far as I know; the subcommittee of the Committee on War Claims having carefully examined it at this session, the committee having reported it, and there being no dissenting report—two committees having examined the complicated facts presented in this record, it does seem to me the House ought to be satisfied with it and make the settlement that is asked to be made.

I am reminded it does not take money out of the Treasury, but is simply a settlement of accounts. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 62.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. RICHARDSON and Mr. GEDDES.

The committee again divided.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw my point of no quorum.

Mr. GEDDES. I renew it.

Mr. MILLS. I move the committee rise, as it is apparent there is no quorum in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion can not be entertained.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no quorum in the committee at present, and I ask by unanimous consent the bill go to the House with report of the facts as they have occurred, and when we go into the House the vote can be taken.

Mr. GEDDES. It must be recommended one way or the other.

Mr. HOLMAN. The usual practice in such cases is to report the bill to the House without recommendation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to that if the record shows how the fact is.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 68.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to report the bill to the House without recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House without recommendation.

Mr. BAYNE. Upon the understanding the yeas and nays are to be called upon its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection that will be done.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported back without recommendation either way the bill (H. R. 5194) directing the Quartermaster-General to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

CHANGE OF RANK ON RETIRED-LIST.

The first business coming over from a previous day was the bill (H. R. 37) to change the rank of an officer on the retired-list of the Army.

The SPEAKER. This bill was reported to the House on the 9th of April with an adverse recommendation.

Mr. STEELE. I ask that this bill go over in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. WHEELER. That bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs, and I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6797) to place the name of Samuel W. Bowling on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place the name of Samuel W. Bowling, late a private in Company D, of the Eleventh Regiment of Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM M. SWARTZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6725) granting a pension to William M. Swartz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the pension laws, the name of William M. Swartz, late of Company F, Forty-sixth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARIA KILE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4145) granting a pension to Maria Kile.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Maria Kile, mother of Nathaniel Kile, late a member in Company K, Fifty-sixth Regiment, New York Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MISS REBECCA MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 813) granting a pension to Miss Rebecca Miller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Miss Rebecca Miller, daughter of the late Brigadier-General Miller, at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. PETERS. I would like to hear the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. ELDREDGE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 813) granting a pension to Miss Rebecca Miller, make the following report:

The father of the lady for whose benefit this bill is introduced was the Colonel Miller who, at the battle of Lundy's Lane, in Canada, in the war of 1812, when asked if he could capture a certain battery of the enemy that was doing great damage to our forces, replied, "I'll try, sir," and instantly charged the battery with his regiment, a most desperate undertaking, and in an almost incredibly short space of time took and silenced the battery, and the battle of Lundy's Lane was won.

His laconic as well as patriotic reply has ever since been the battle-cry of our soldiers, and he has inspired many a heroic deed by officers and men.

Colonel Miller became a general, and performed faithful and gallant service until the conclusion of peace with Great Britain.

He died leaving two maiden daughters, with no property but a homestead, a small farm, which afforded them but a meager support. Congress passed an act granting to these two sisters a pension of $15 per month each some years since.

In September, 1855, the younger sister died, leaving Rebecca Miller, the one mentioned in this bill, now seventy-two years old and terribly crippled by rheumatism, entirely unable by age and disease to perform any kind of work, and without any means of support except the small pension heretofore granted her and the little (and which is very slight, often not paying expenses of cultivation), which she receives from the little farm which she occupies.

It is true that when her father performed the gallant acts as a soldier which made him famous throughout the whole civilized world, she was but an infant, and had nothing to do with her father's grand soldierly conduct or the benefits he gave his country, but your committee deem it no more than just, at least magnanimous in a great country as this has now become, to give this only surviving child—now old, decrepit, and needy—of a soldier who performed such gallant service to his country a sum sufficient to render her life comfortable during the short time she will be likely to live.

Attached hereto are two petitions, signed by men of high standing.

The committee are also in possession of several affidavits of leading citizens, including medical evidence of her enfeebled condition.

The committee do therefore recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALLEN P. JACOBS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5622) granting a pension to Allen P. Jacobs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Allen P. Jacobs, a soldier of the war of 1812, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, as of February 14, 1871.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "pension-roll," in line 6, and insert "and pay him a pension at the rate of $25 a month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BRADY. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report (by Mr. BRADY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5622) granting a pension to Allen P. Jacobs, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

That Allen P. Jacobs, of Owen County, Kentucky, before he was sixteen years of age, was sent by his father to attend his sick brother, Elijah —. Jacobs, who was a soldier in Captain Williams's company, Colonel Whistler's regiment, in the war of 1812; that upon his arrival at Dayton, Ohio, where the United States troops were then located, he, the said Allen P. Jacobs, finding that his brother had recovered from his sickness, joined Col. R. M. Johnson's regiment in its pursuit of the Indians and British, and that on the 5th day of October, 1813, this command was engaged with the enemy at the battle of the River Thames; that young Allen P. Jacobs was conspicuous for his bravery in said battle, in which he was severely wounded by a bullet-shot through the thigh, about midway between the hip joint and the knee. It does not appear from the records of the War Department that he was regularly mustered into the service of the United States, and therefore the Pension Office have not acted upon his application for pension; but that as a boy he volunteered, served gallantly in the field with the United States Army, and was severely wounded, as above stated, is clearly shown by the testimony filed with the papers in the case and examined by the committee.

This veteran is now nearly eighty-nine years of age, he is almost helpless, and still a great sufferer from the wound he received in his country's service seventy-three years ago, and now in his old age he is compelled to live on the charity and kindness of friends.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended, and as amended that it do pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY MURPHY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4730) for the relief of Mary Murphy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of Mary Murphy, widow of Thomas Murphy, late a private of marines, may be placed on the pension-roll of the United States Pension Office, together with such of her children as were minors at the date of the death of the said Thomas Murphy, November 29, 1874, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, and to commence from the date of the death of the said Murphy.

The amendment reported by the committee was to make the bill read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Mary Murphy, widow of Thomas Murphy, late a private of marines, on the pension-roll of the United States, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

Mr. BRADY. I ask that the report in this case be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The report (by Mr. BRADY) was as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4730) granting a pension to Mary Murphy, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

That Mary Murphy is the widow of Thomas Murphy, late a private of the United States Marine Corps, and her application for pension was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the immediate cause of her said husband's death was typhoid fever and gastritis, as shown by the death certificate of the health officer of Washington, D. C.

It appears from the evidence that the said Thomas Murphy, while in the service of the United States as a marine in the year 1866, contracted pneumonia, from which he never recovered.

Abbie Paul and Anna Parker, who knew him well, swear:

"That from the time Murphy came home he coughed badly; that the cough never left him; that the difficulty in his chest seemed to grow worse; he became weaker, until he finally died."

Arthur Flynn, a brother marine, swears:

"Murphy was disabled in service; that on account of illness he was sent to hospital, and never recovered his health, and during all the time had a bad cough, and raised a large quantity of phlegm.

Dr. G. S. Magruder, of Washington, D. C., swears:

"That he attended Thomas Murphy for pneumonia about March, 1873, and attended him through the attack."

Dr. J. E. Bracket, of Washington, D. C., swears:

"That he attended Murphy; that his condition was bad, having contracted pneumonia in the service, from which he never fully recovered, and that he died from the effects of said disease."

Dr. Bracket, at the time of Murphy's death, gave a certificate for burial to the effect that he died of typhoid fever, and upon this and the certificate of the health officer the Pension Office rejected the widow's application for pension.

In a letter dated March 4, 1886, to Hon. W. H. PERRY, Representative in the present Congress from the State of South Carolina, Dr. Bracket frankly acknowledges his error in issuing said death certificate, and is clear and positive in stating that Murphy died of consumption, contracted in the United States service. The records of the Washington naval hospital show that he was there treated for "pneumonia; duty exposure."

From the testimony herein given, the committee is of the opinion that Thomas Murphy died of disease contracted while in the service of the United States as a marine; and therefore they report back the bill with amendments, and as amended recommend that the same do pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS R. WARE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7881) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas R. Ware, of Virginia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That Thomas R. Ware, of the State of Virginia, is hereby relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the same are hereby removed.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

I. G. FLOURNOY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7650) to remove the political disabilities of I. G. Flournoy, of Mississippi.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That I. G. Flournoy, of the State of Mississippi, is hereby relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all the pension bills in the hands of the Clerk have now been disposed of. There are other pension bills on the Calendar, but the bills and reports, having been presented yesterday, have not yet been received from the Printer.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration bills upon the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendments, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed; namely:

A bill (H. R. 5622) granting a pension to Allen P. Jacobs; and
A bill (H. R. 4730) for the relief of Mary Murphy.

The following Senate bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were severally ordered to a third reading; and were accordingly read the third time and passed, namely:

A bill (S. 231) granting a pension to Jennette S. Kent;
A bill (S. 283) granting a pension to Isaac N. Minshall; and
A bill (S. 813) granting a pension to Mrs. Rebecca Miller.

The following bills for the removal of political disabilities were passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof), namely:

A bill (H. R. 7650) to remove the political disabilities of I. G. Fournoy, of Mississippi; and
A bill (H. R. 7881) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas R. Ware, of Virginia.

Mr. BRADY moved to reconsider the several votes by which pension bills were passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRILL (at 8 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 17, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WEATHER MAP OF SIGNAL BUREAU.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with inclosures, a letter from the Chief Signal Officer concerning the claim of the American Graphic Company for publishing a weather map of the Signal Bureau, and recommending its payment; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN RANDOLPH HAMILTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2156) for the relief of John Randolph Hamilton, of the State of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 1851) granting a pension to Mrs. M. Z. Gilman, the Chair finds, on examination, should have been referred to the Committee on Pensions. In the absence of objection the Committee on Invalid Pensions will be discharged from its further consideration, and it will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also finds that certain executive communications have been improperly referred. If there be no objection the Chair will direct the Clerk to change the reference of each to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and the following changes of reference were accordingly made:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department was discharged from the further consideration of the letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting correspondence recommending that provision be made for four additional watchmen at the silver vaults in the new post-office building, Philadelphia; and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department was discharged from the further consideration of the letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting letter from the Secretary of the Interior recommending that the salaries of members of the board of pension appeals be increased; and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department was discharged from the further consideration of the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Director of the Mint and asking that the salaries of the examiner of mints and the comptuter of bullion be increased to $2,500 per annum; and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an additional estimate from the Secretary of War of an appropriation for the Signal Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department was discharged from the further consideration of the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency relative to the inadequacy of the salary of the deputy comptroller of the currency, and recommending that it be increased; and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JAMES, for four days, on account of business.

To Mr. LANDES, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. CRISP, for ten days.

To Mr. JOHNSON, of New York, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WADSWORTH, for ten days; and

To Mr. HEARD, for ten days, on account of important business.

CAPTAIN JOHN BURKHART.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up from the Private Calendar and pass a very small bill, involving three or four hundred dollars, for the benefit of a soldier of the late war. It is a meritorious measure. The settlement of the claim has been delayed unfortunately for many years. I am satisfied that when the bill shall have been read there will be no objection to it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Burkhart, late captain of Company F, One hundred and forty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, in the late war, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army, the pay and emoluments of captain of said company from March 1, 1865, to June 22, 1865, deducting from the sum found due him as the pay and emoluments of captain of said company for the period above specified the sums of money that have been paid to the said John Burkhart for military service, either as a private or otherwise, rendered by him during the period above specified.

Mr. BEACH. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but I trust my friend from Indiana will furnish the House with an explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. I ask that the report of the Committee on War Claims be read.

The report (by Mr. GEDDES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 446) for the relief of Capt. John Burkhart, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

John Burkhart, the claimant, enlisted as a private, Company F, One hundred and forty-sixth Regiment, Indiana Volunteers, March 1, 1865, at Greensburg, Ind., to serve one year.

On regimental returns for March, April, and May he is reported as captain Company F of said regiment, president; he was mustered out with his company as private August 31, 1865, at Baltimore, Md. The military history of said claimant, obtained from the War Department, further shows that Barton W. Cole was mustered in as captain of said Company F, to date June 23, 1865, to fill original vacancy.

The claimant organized Company F at Camp Carrington, Indianapolis, Ind., and was commissioned as captain by the governor of said State on the 1st day of March, 1865, and had charge of the company from that time until the 22d day of June, 1865, during which time he was recognized and obeyed as such, and performed all the duties as captain of said company. Merrett C. Welch, the colonel of said regiment, in his testimony, says:

"During the time said Burkhart was in command of said company he was one of the most efficient company commanders in the regiment, a good disciplinarian, and the best drill officer in my regiment. He was always pleasant, yet prompt to duty, and after he ceased to command said company his bearing and conduct as a private soldier was unexceptionally good."

Your committee find from the exhibits and testimony in the case that claimant performed all the dutifes of a captain of said Company F from the date of his commission by the governor of Indiana, March 15, 1865, to the 22d of June, 1865, and failed to be mustered in on a purely technical ground. On February 24, 1865, the governor of Indiana requested of the War Department the removal of the disability occasioned by the resignation caused by John Burkhart as of the Sixty-eighth Indiana Volunteers with a view of his accepting a new commission in the One hundred and forty-sixth Indiana Volunteers. Anticipating a favorable reply, the governor, on March 1, 1865, issued a commission to said Burkhart as captain of Company F, One hundred and forty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, but said disability was not removed, and claimant was not therefore mustered in as captain, and his commission as such was on that account canceled by the governor of Indiana, and the said Barton W. Cole commissioned in his stead.

Your committee therefore recommend that claimant be allowed the pay and emoluments of a captain of said company from said 1st day of March, 1865, to said 22d day of June, 1865, deducting therefrom the sums of money that have been paid to him for military service during that period either as a private or otherwise, and for that purpose report the accompanying bill as a substitute for bill H. R. 446, and recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not understand just what is meant by the "disability" under which this officer seems to have labored.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from Texas will allow me to explain I will state that Captain Burkhart had been a lieutenant in the Sixty-eighth Indiana Regiment. He had resigned that office. Afterward, at the instance of the governor of Indiana, he raised Company F of the One hundred and forty-sixth Indiana Regiment. The governor, assuming that the objection to his being commissioned in the new regiment would be readily removed by the War Department, gave Captain Burkhart his commission on the 1st of March, 1865. He went with his company to the seat of war, and continued to act as captain in the service till June 22, 1865. But finally the War Department declined to remove the objection on account of the former resignation, and therefore he was not mustered in and his commission was withdrawn. The service was rendered for the entire period named—three or four months—at the end of which time he resumed his post in the ranks, and served until the regiment was mustered out. Mr. Cole was appointed captain and assumed the command of the company on the 23d of June, 1865. Captain Burkhart, alike as captain and private soldier, made a most honorable and gallant record in the Union Army.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. I see the bill directs the payment of this person to be made out of the appropriations for the pay of the Army. That is an annual appropriation, and contemplates the pay of the Army as it stands. It does not occur to me that this payment ought to be provided for in that way.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think my friend will find there will be any trouble about that. If there is, it will be corrected hereafter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit to the gentleman from Indiana himself if this would not take the money from a fund devoted to another purpose?

Mr. REAGAN. This seems to be a case in which this man resigned his position in the Army, and, having asked authority from the Government to raise an additional company, went and raised a company, and now demands the pay of captain.

Mr. HOLMAN. He not only raised the company under commission as second lieutenant, but was commissioned captain by the governor of Indiana, and actually performed the service for nearly four months.

Mr. REAGAN. He was not commissioned by the Government?

Mr. HOLMAN. He was commissioned by the governor of the State. He is reported as captain for three or four successive months. The Government had the benefit of his services for that time, and he surely is entitled to be paid for his services notwithstanding the action of the War Department.

Mr. BEACH. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEACH. I would like to know why the beneficiary of this bill can not receive the money that may be due him under the act that passed last Congress?

Mr. HOLMAN. Because of the technical objection which I have stated.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I think the objection made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is a valid one. The appropriations for the Army are made upon estimates of the cost of the support of the Army. This is simply a claim, and should be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BLOUNT. We might as well direct the Secretary of War to pay any other claim out of the Army appropriation.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly. Therefore I think the bill should be amended so as to direct payment to be made out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I consent to that amendment, although it is unnecessary, as the sum appropriated for the pay of the Army always exceeds the sum required. Let the amendment be made.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will be adopted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what rank this man held on the Army roll at the time for which this claim is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reports show that he ranked as a captain and performed duty as such.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZUR B. HALL.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5891) to authorize a patent for the south half of the southeast quarter of section 34, in township 22, of range 15, east of the sixth principal meridian, to Elizur B. Hall, as administrator of the estate of William Frederick Schlagel, and that the House proceed to consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a patent shall issue to Elizur B. Hall, as administrator of the estate of William Frederick Schlagel, for the south half of the southeast quarter of section 34, in township 22, of range 15, east of the sixth principal meridian, in the usual form and with the usual covenants, as far as may be practicable.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY, ARSENAL GROUNDS, PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 880, granting the right of way to the Schuylkill River East Side Railroad Company through the arsenal and naval asylum grounds at Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. I desire to know whether the bill whose consideration is now asked is on the House Calendar or on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BEACH. I find a bill here with the same title on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, which the Chair thinks was erroneously put upon the House Calendar. It is a bill for the benefit of a private corporation, and properly belongs to the Private Calendar, as the Chair thinks. The Senate bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Schuylkill River East Side Railroad Company is hereby authorized to construct its railroad across the grounds of the United States forming a part of the grounds of the naval asylum and of the arsenal at Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania; and for that purpose said company is hereby granted a width of 60 feet across said grounds for its right of way through the grounds aforesaid: Provided, That the location of said road through said grounds shall be approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy; and the damages for the use and occupation of the right of way herein granted shall be fixed by a board of two Army officers appointed by the Secretary of War and one officer of the Navy appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and the payment of said damages so fixed shall be a condition precedent to the exercise of the rights by this act granted: And provided further, That in the construction of said road through said grounds the said company shall be required to construct thereon a bulkhead upon the bulkhead line on the Schuylkill River, as fixed by the port-wardens of the city of Philadelphia. As soon as the damages have been assessed by said board in the manner hereinbefore provided, the same shall be paid by said company into the Treasury of the United States: And provided further, That no trains of said company shall be allowed to stop or stand on said naval asylum grounds, except under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy; and that no bells or whistles shall be sounded upon any train or engine of said company while on said grounds; and that the tracks of such railroad on said naval asylum grounds shall be so arranged and paved and kept always in good order, so as to permit the easy passage of vehicles across the same; and that such watchman or watchmen shall be kept by said railroad company on said grounds, at its expense, as the Secretary of the Navy shall deem necessary for the protection of persons or property on or in the neighborhood of said railroad on said grounds: And provided further, also, That the said company shall construct a proper switch and siding upon said arsenal grounds, and suitable means for crossing to the wharf on said arsenal grounds, for the purpose of receiving and shipping freight by water. Any violation of any of the provisions of this act by said company, or its successors or assigns, shall work a forfeiture of all rights granted by this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to object. I desire, however, that the bill be considered for a few moments with reference to the question of the measure of damages.

The SPEAKER. It is open to amendment. The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, a bill for the purpose indicated in this bill was introduced in the House and contained a provision that the benefit resulting to the Government by the construction of this railroad through its grounds should be taken into consideration in the assessment of the damages. It seems to me that that is not a sound principle in a case like this, but I am told that that provision is not contained in the bill as now presented. If it is not, I am not aware of any other objection to the bill, but I ask that that portion of it which provides for the appointment of the appraisers by the Secretaries of War and the Navy may be read again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read again that portion of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the location of said road through said grounds shall be approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy; and the damages for the use and occupation of the right of way herein granted shall be fixed by a board of two Army officers appointed by the Secretary of War and one officer of the Navy appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and the payment of said damages so fixed shall be a condition precedent to the exercise of the right by this act granted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see that the provision in the other bill which I thought objectionable is not in the bill as now presented.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILKINS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That will require a two-thirds vote.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 95, noes 14.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I make the point that no quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. DIBBLE were appointed.

Mr. DUNHAM (during the count by tellers). I hope my colleague on the Committee on Commerce, that committee having been treated so well a week ago, will withdraw the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. There is a quorum present, and I want the vote to show it.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 140, noes 24.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion of Mr. DIBBLE was agreed to.

EXPORT TOBACCO MANUFACTORIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under the rule, will proceed to call the committees for the consideration of bills. The call rests with the Committee on Ways and Means. The Clerk will read the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2522) to authorize the establishment of export tobacco manufactories, and for drawback upon imported articles used in manufacturing exported tobacco.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], upon which no quorum voted. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 of section 2, strike out "90 per cent." and insert "the whole amount."

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has agreed to yield me two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered, and debate is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask unanimous consent to make some remarks on this amendment, not to exceed three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, I feel reluctant to object to this bill, because I believe in every measure calculated to facilitate our export trade with the rest of the world; but as the bill is now framed it will create a monopoly in favor of those tobacco manufacturers who are engaged solely in the export trade. A tobacco concern making tobacco regardless of where it is to be sold—in New York or in Melbourne—will under this bill get a rebate of 90 per cent. on the imported articles entering into the tobacco so made. But the manufacturer who makes tobacco solely for export gets 100 per cent., a difference of 10 per cent. in favor of those establishments making tobacco solely for export, a monopoly being thus created in their favor by Government action.

One word as to the practical operation of this bill if passed in its present form; and I sincerely hope, if the amendment be not agreed to, that in justice to the great tobacco manufacturing interests of this country the bill will be defeated. A large establishment engaged in the manufacture of tobacco and snuff must, if this bill passes, in order to meet its requirements, revolutionize its entire trade; it must erect a new building, introduce a new set of machinery, and a new foreman. Any establishment, however small, in order to take advantage of this bill, will be obliged to erect a separate building.

Gentlemen have spoken of the necessity of separate establishments for the manufacture of export tobacco with the view of preventing fraud. But if they will look at the first and second sections of the bill they will see it is provided that the act is to be carried out under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, so that, if the amendment of the gentlemen from Virginia be adopted, there will be no opportunity for fraud, because the Secretary of the Treasury can adopt such rules and regulations as will prevent any such possibility.

One other point. It has been said here that the object of retaining this 10 per cent. rebate is to pay the Government for expenses it may incur in the detection of fraud. Now, that argument might be good if applied to articles the manufacture of which is not supervised by the Government—cosmetics, perfumery, and the like. But the tobacco business is supervised directly by the Government, an agent being located at the factory; and there will be no additional cost to the Government in the prevention of fraud under this bill. So that the argument in favor of retaining this 10 per cent. rebate does not apply. I sincerely hope the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will be adopted or that the bill will be defeated.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, how much time is left for debate?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered, and no debate is in order.

Mr. MILLS. How did the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] obtain the floor?

Several MEMBERS. By unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLS. Then I ask unanimous consent to speak for a few moments upon this amendment. I ask three minutes—the same time occupied by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will proceed.

Mr. CABELL. If there is to be any further discussion I think the debate ought to be open to all, so that every gentleman interested may have an opportunity to express his views.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. WISE. I object.

Mr. MORRISON. As the gentleman objects to debate, I will only say that I disagree with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO]. I think the bill ought to be voted down if the amendment is adopted, because in that form it will tend to promote fraud or make the perpetration of fraud easy. The gentleman from New Jersey wants the bill voted down if the amendment is not made part of the bill. He thinks this necessary, to place all manufacturers for export, whether in exporting warehouses or in other warehouses.

Mr. CABELL. I say the bill ought to be passed, as it is a very proper one.

Mr. MILLS. Who objected?

Mr. WISE. I did.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman spoke for ten or fifteen minutes on the amendment, and now objects to my being heard for two or three minutes in opposition to it. I hope the House will vote the amendment down and be in favor of the bill reported by the committee.

The question recurred on the amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 83.

Mr. MCADOO. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. MCADOO and Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. MCADOO. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCADOO demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 13.

So, no further count being demanded, the bill was passed.

Mr. HARRIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM OVERFLOW, ALABAMA.

Mr. FORNEY. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to call up the bill (H. R. 7645) for the relief of the sufferers by the overflow of the rivers in Alabama, and move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of that measure.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 67.

Mr. FORNEY. No quorum has voted.

Mr. FORNEY and Mr. BEACH were appointed as tellers.

Mr. BEACH. Is it in order to call for the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BEACH. I think that is the best way to dispose of this matter.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us first try it by tellers.

Mr. BEACH. I withdraw my demand for the yeas and nays.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44——

Mr. HERBERT. This only provides for $150,000, and I think at least we should be granted a hearing on the subject.

The tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 71.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the bill (H. R 7645) for the relief of the sufferers by the overflow, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of War in the purchase and distribution of subsistence stores and other necessary articles to such destitute persons as may require assistance in the districts recently overflowed by the rivers in Alabama; and he is authorized to co-operate with the authorities of the said State and of the cities situated in said overflowed districts in making distribution of the same; and he is authorized, in his discretion, to use any steamers and other boats and vessels belonging to or now employed by the Government in the transportation and distribution of the supplies furnished by the United States or individuals to and among said destitute and suffering people; and he may employ such other means of transportation as he may deem necessary to carry the purpose of this act into effect.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report of the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope its reading will receive the attention of the members of the committee, as it contains the telegrams received by the committee and upon which the pending measure was reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FORNEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted the following report:

[To accompany bill H. R. 7645.]

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 155) appropriating $300,000 for the relief of the sufferers by the overflow of the rivers in Alabama, having considered the same, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, which appropriates $150,000, as a substitute therefor.

The following telegrams were submitted to the Committee on Appropriations during their consideration of the question of relief to the sufferers by the overflow of the rivers in Alabama:

MONTGOMERY, ALA., April 5, 1886.

Hon. H. A. HERBERT, House of Representatives:

City and county authorities unable to cope with the distress from overflow; principally colored people. Can't you help us with the Government?

C. L. MATTHEWS. W. L. CHAMBERS.
JOSHUA MORRIS. W. W. ALLEN.
F. C. RANDOLPH. JOS. GOETTER.
H. C. MOSES. E. B. JOSEPH.
K. M. P. LEGRAND.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., April 5, 1886.

Hon. J. L. PUGH, JOHN T. MORGAN, H. A. HERBERT, A. C. DAVIDSON, and J. M. MARTIN:

Our information is that suffering from flood is so great impossible for local authorities to relieve.

H. R. SHORTERS.
W. C. TANSTALL.
H. C. TOMPKINS.

SELMA, ALA., April 5, 1886.

The Senators and Representatives of Alabama, Washington, D. C.:

This flood has been more destructive than any we have ever heard of in Alabama. Thousands of people along the river are without food, clothing, or shelter; mostly colored people. We are supplying all we can. This is a case of extreme necessity. Can not the Government aid these helpless people?

E. W. PETTUS,
H. S. D. MALLARY,
F. BOYKIN, JR.,
Committee of Citizens' Meeting.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., April 5, 1885.

Hon. H. A. HERBERT,
Washington, D. C.:

The distress among the colored people in the overflowed district is terrible to contemplate, and while the county and municipal authorities and the citizens generally are responding nobly, they can not relieve the necessities of the unfortunate. Please, therefore, urge an immediate appropriation by Congress.

W. R. WESTCOTT,
W. D. BROWN,
A. H. HUBBARD,
Members Board Revenue, Montgomery County.

[Copy of telegram to governor of Alabama.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 5, 1886.

Governor E. A. O'NEAL,
Montgomery, Ala.:

Does the situation in Alabama require relief for the people injured by the flood which the State can not furnish?

What is needed—rations or money; at what points and what quantities?

Will the State undertake to distribute if Congress grants relief?

I telegraph by direction of the delegation.

WM. H. FORNEY.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., April 6, 1886.

Hon. WILLIAM H. FORNEY,
House of Representatives:

There is distress and destitution in all the river counties of the State. The State can not give relief without a special session of the Legislature, which can not be had in time to meet the emergency. If Congress makes an appropriation, let it be in money, and if thought best I will undertake its distribution. As at present advised, my opinion is that $150,000 will be sufficient.

A. E. O'NEIL, Governor.

During the year 1884 similar aid was granted to the sufferers by the overflow of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and $500,000 was appropriated therefor. (See Statutes at Large, volume 23, pages 267–269 and 273.)

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, the precedent was established during 1884 in the case of the overflow of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. The overflow of the rivers in Alabama has been greater than ever known before, and there are to-day thousands of people in that State destitute and suffering.

We have quite a number of rivers in Alabama. In the northern portion of the State there is the Tennessee River, where there has been an overflow. In the eastern portion the Coosa River also was overflowed. The overflow reached 9 feet higher than ever before. Then comes the Tallapoosa. The confluence of those two rivers forms the Alabama, where the overflow has been unprecedented. Numbers of plantations have been covered with water. The rivers have reached the highest point in fifty years.

To-day, fellow-citizens [laughter]—yes, Mr. Chairman, we are to-day all fellow-citizens. [Applause.]

Now, sir, I want to say at this time from Elmore County down to the bay of Mobile there are over 25,000 people suffering on account of this flood. As evidence of that I desire the Clerk to read a telegram from most respectable gentlemen, which will furnish some idea of the condition of that country at this time. I ask for its reading the attention of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

SELMA, ALA., April 9, 1886.

To Hon. Alex. C. Davidson, Washington, D. C.:

Twenty-five thousand people live within the overflowed district of Dallas, Wilcox, and Lowndes Counties. Twelve thousand of these are absolutely destitute. Other counties in this State along the Alabama, Coosa, and Tallapoosa Rivers will average with those of the fourth Congressional district, above named. The overflowed area along the Tombigbee, Warrior, and Cahaba Rivers is not extensive, but the suffering is great.

E. W. PETTUS.
H. S. D. MALLARY.
F. BOYKIN, JR.

Mr. FORNEY. That telegram refers to three counties in the State, where twenty-five thousand people are sufferers from the overflow; twelve thousand five hundred of whom are to-day destitute and suffering. They reside in Lowndes, Dallas, and Wilcox Counties. The greatest suffering no doubt is in Montgomery County. There are at least five or six thousand people who are in destitution, caused by the overflow of the Alabama River. The counties where the greatest suffering prevails are Coosa, Elmore, Autauga, Montgomery, Lowndes, Dallas, and Wilcox.

The amount we ask is only $150,000. The people of the State have been contributing largely of their own means, but the distress is so great and so widespread that they can not supply all, and they come now and appeal to Congress, asking that the Government will at least assist them in this emergency in view of the fact that the Legislature can not be called together in time, and the citizens are unable to render the assistance that is demanded.

Now, as my colleague from the second Congressional district [Mr. HERBERT] represents a section of the State which is perhaps more seriously injured than any other by these freshets, and is more in need of assistance, and since my district is not suffering so greatly—we are not asking relief, as we are higher up the country—I yield to him such length of time as he may desire.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Let me ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] a question.

Mr. FORNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Have the waters subsided, or do they still cover the country?

Mr. FORNEY. The waters have subsided, but the people have been left destitute.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I wanted to know that fact, because——

Mr. FORNEY. But before I conclude I desire now to have another telegram read bearing upon this same question, which comes from a mass meeting of the colored citizens of Dallas County. The people who are mainly suffering now are the colored population, for in that region of country where these floods have been most disastrous that class of the population outnumbers the white perhaps 4 to 1.

I ask to have this telegram read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SELMA, ALA., April 9, 1886.

To Alabama Representatives in Congress, Washington:

We, the colored citizens of Selma, Ala., in mass meeting, to the honorable the House of Representatives, in session in Washington, D. C. We urge immediate appropriation for at least seventy-five thousand persons, rendered homeless and utterly destitute in the flooded districts of Alabama. Unless aid come immediately the suffering will be great—beyond calculation. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars is not half enough to relieve the destitution until we can help ourselves.

R. M. CHEEKS, Chairman.
C. O. BOOTH, Secretary.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama if he is willing to accept an amendment appropriating a further sum for the relief of the cyclone sufferers in Minnesota?

Mr. HAMMOND (from his seat). Yes.

Mr. FORNEY. I do not know anything about that; I have never heard of it before. I did not know that assistance was needed.

I think you ought to let our little matter go through, however, without any incumbrance; and if this is a matter which demands our attention, and the gentleman brings it before the committee, I can assure him that it will have prompt consideration.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama how long it has been since this flood took place; and if the destitution was so apparent, why this bill has not been presented before?

Mr. FORNEY. This was considered by the committee and passed immediately upon the information reaching us. It was considered as promptly as we could get at it in the committee. This has been before the House for several days, as the gentleman will remember.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask the question because I notice that these telegrams are not of very recent date.

Mr. FORNEY. The class of persons most afflicted are those belonging to the farming community. They are the persons who work on shares or rent the lands. They are principally dependent upon the commission merchants and landlords for supplies, and the commission merchants have already furnished them with supplies for this year; they have drawn upon the commission merchants for this season, and now all of their supplies and all of their means of making their crops have been swept away. Their stock has been carried away, and the landlords are not able to furnish them with the means to make a crop. The result is an immense amount of destitution, which, unless aid is given to them, will be greatly increased in the future, because all they can now rely upon is the charity of the public and the aid of Congress; and being without means of making a crop, of course the condition will be worse next fall and winter.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let me ask the gentleman from Alabama how long this condition of affairs has been going on?

Mr. FORNEY. About two weeks.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. How much stock has been lost?

Mr. FORNEY. I suppose millions of dollars' worth of stock and other property have been lost in the State.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. What information have you or your committee as to the amount of stock actually lost?

Mr. FORNEY. I am informed that cattle, mules, and horses in large numbers have been swept away, and many of the colored people themselves have been drowned. The flood has rendered thousands of people not only homeless but absolutely destitute.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But has the gentleman from Alabama any written information as to the exact condition of affairs and the actual extent of the losses there?

Mr. FORNEY. Why, every newspaper in the State of Alabama shows that this condition of affairs exists, and that the floods have been unprecedented and the damage greater than ever has been known before from such a source. It shows that from the Tennessee River down to Mobile Bay every water course in the State has been swollen to an unprecedented extent, bridges swept away, culverts destroyed, plantations flooded, stock carried off; the Coosa River was 9 feet higher than was ever known before, and the Alabama 6 feet higher than the highest record within the last fifty years.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is not what I desired to ask the gentleman. I asked the gentleman if he had any information, or if he was in possession of any facts, showing the extent of the destruction to working stock. Nothing has been read here indicating that a single mule or a single work-horse has been lost. That is the information I would like to get.

Mr. FORNEY. My understanding is that it is almost universal along these streams. On one plantation alone I have information that twenty-five mules were swept away, and all the cattle and horses. Down upon the Warrior River the information is that there have been vast losses in stock and plantation supplies, and the same condition of affairs exists on the Alabama River as well as other streams throughout the State. The Alabama River extended at one time to 10 miles wide in many places.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. How wide is this bottom-land region which has been overflowed?

Mr. FORNEY. The Alabama River extended at one time 10 miles wide.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I mean what is the width of that region?

Mr. FORNEY. I say the river extended to 10 miles wide in some places; from 1 mile up to 10.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That I suppose does not represent the greatest width of that region of the country?

Mr. FORNEY. That region, I will state to the gentleman, is a kind of delta——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I am not asking the gentleman as to its condition. We have had remarks upon that. What I want now is information as to the width of that alluvial region.

Mr. FORNEY. It is all lowland country, extending from 20 to 30 miles wide.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I have often crossed that region of country myself.

Mr. HERBERT. Let me state to my colleague that this questioning will take up all the time allotted to the committee, and it is important that action should be taken on this measure.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. These are questions which are important, because they bring out information that we ought to have.

Mr. FORNEY. I have only this to say in response to the gentlman from Arkansas, that from one side to the other this whole region is an alluvial plain, undoubtedly once the bed of a sea.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. You are talking now of the prairie region?

Mr. NELSON. I ask the gentleman from Alabama if he will permit an amendment making provision for the cyclone sufferers in Minnesota?

Mr. FORNEY. I do not know anything about that. I am not authorized to accept any such amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama I do not see that we have any way of providing relief to the sufferers by the cyclone unless we bring it by way of an amendment to the bill.

Mr. FORNEY. You can introduce a bill for that purpose. But I would suggest that the path of a cyclone is very narrow as compared with the extent of this devastation. This overflowed district is 400 miles in length, extending from one end of the State to the other.

Mr. NELSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that by increasing the appropriation to $100,000 the bill could be made to include the sufferers by the cyclone. Three towns have been almost destroyed.

Mr. FORNEY. The bill, I suppose, will be open to amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Does the gentleman accept the amendment?

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman from Alabama had ever seen a cyclone he would have known it is something worse than the overflow of water.

Mr. OATES. I ask my colleague to yield to me.

Mr. FORNEY. For how long?

Mr. OATES. I may want not exceeding ten minutes.

Mr. FORNEY. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. OATES].

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] does not accept the amendment which has been suggested to provide for the relief of the sufferers by the cyclone, I hope he will give his views on the constitutional question involved. Certainly that ought to be discussed.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I regret to differ with my colleagues upon this measure. Since I have had the honor to be a member of the House of Representatives of the United States I have, with uniformity, whenever measures similar to this have been presented, cast my vote against them; and, sir, I can not make an exception in favor of my own State. This measure is confessedly outside of the Constitution. I believe that the oath of office I took to support that instrument would be violated if I went outside of it and usurped authority to appropriate the people's money. [Applause.] And I shall never do it knowingly.

It is true, sir, that there was a great overflow of these rivers in Alabama and much destruction of property and much suffering; but, sir, that was two or three weeks ago. The people who suffered most, temporarily, were the colored people residing on the plantations in the river bottoms. The people who lost the property were the owers of the plantations, and to-day the rivers of Alabama are within their banks if I am correctly informed by the newspaper press; and in consequence of the destruction of the houses and fences there is more work needed and more employment for those who labor and at better wages than they are accustomed to get. They have but to work and the supplies will be abundant, and they will be paid well for their labor.

During the period of their suffering the generous people of Alabama who had it to give contributed with liberal hands to their relief all along those streams which had overflowed. But to-day I apprehend the suffering amounts to little, although it has been very considerable.

The last telegram which was read, the House will note, was dated on the 9th instant. This is the 17th. There is a marked difference between the state of the water to-day and what it was when that telegram was sent.

And now, sir, as indicative of public opinion on this subject in the State of Alabama, I have retained two—I had four—of the daily papers speaking out on that subject, and I will ask that extracts from editorial articles of two of those leading papers be read to the House. I first send to the desk a copy of the Daily Dispatch, published in Montgomery, Ala.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE RESULT OF FEDERAL AID.

Aside from the constitutional question as to the right of Congress to grant Federal aid to the overflowed sufferers, there is another feature to be considered in this matter which concerns more directly the farming interests.

If such an appropriation should be made by Congress, as soon as it is known by the negroes in the overflowed districts they will drop their plow-handles and the grubbing-hoe, lose all interest in the farm, and flock to the cities, or the the supply depots, no matter where located, to get their share of the Government "perwisions." Labor will be completely demoralized, and farm work will be neglected and delayed. Nothing can be done on the farm till everybody has secured his full share of the "overflowed bacon," and has used it up and made his second trip for another supply, and then learned that there is no more for him, and that he must go to work and earn his own bread by the sweat of his brow.

If the present appropriation bill of $150,000, agreed on by the House committee yesterday, passes Congress, it will prove a curse rather than a blessing to the farming interests of Alabama. Our Congressmen should take warning from Strobach's "overflowed bacon." It did him as little good as it did the people who were supposed to get it.

Mr. FORNEY. What paper is that?

Mr. OATES. The Montgomery Daily Dispatch. I now ask the Clerk to read a passage I have marked, being an editorial in the Selma Morning Times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent that this short editorial be read from the Daily Times of Selma, where the dispatch came from which was read from the desk.

Mr. FORNEY. I yield my colleague time to have the extract read.

The Clerk read as follows:

We think it very likely that Mr. HERBERT's resolution appropriating $150,000 for the flooded district will pass. If the Alabama delegation asks it the House will grant it almost as a matter of course, and the old woman from New Hampshire will see it through the Senate. The President need not stickle, and will not probably, to sign it. After that comes the deluge. We trust that the first man who gets hand on the fund will steal it and run off to Siam. If it is ever distributed it will do a million dollars of damage by demoralizing labor in the river counties. We used to think some disease and disaster was the portion of every man born into the world, and he was expected to stand up under it as best he could. In the great grab game, now so popular, nature herself is outwitted and each man lives at the expense of others. The General Government shoulders all disasters, private and public, and by the grab game we are all made happy.

[Much laughter.]

Mr. OATES. I would like to say more, but the five minutes yielded to me by my colleague have expired. I shall not insist.

Mr. FORNEY. As an offset to what has just been read I send to the desk, to be read, an editorial from the Daily Advertiser of Montgomery, a leading paper of the State, having an extensive circulation. It is of the 15th instant, after the flood had subsided.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRESS ON ACCOUNT OF THE FLOOD.

Some newspapers, criticising the action of Alabama's Representatives in introducing a bill appropriating money for sufferers by the recent unexampled flood in this State, are not altogether just in their remarks. Let it be understood once for all that fully fifteen thousand people have been put practically on the charity list. They will have to remain there until they can make a crop or get one under such headway as to obtain advances. Many of them had already strained their credit to the utmost in getting mules and supplies. These have been swept away, and they are left in a pitiable condition. Merchants have done all they could to start them, and could not try to support them for three or four months without running the risk of bankrupting themselves. The State of Alabama is forbidden by its constitution to borrow money for any purpose except to pay existing debts. It could not make an appropriation to meet the present extraordinary suffering without running the risk of leaving her debts unpaid and her charitable institutions in trouble. Private charity, with the best plan arranged, could not in months reach the people deserving of succor and for these reasons the appeal was made to Congress.

Under similar circumstances other sections of the country, with a more prosperous population than ours, and in States with great cities and millions of property, have been relieved, and it was thought similar action would be taken for the benefit of the poor unfortunates who live along the banks of the Coosa, Tallapoosa, Warrior, Alabama, and other rivers in this State. There would have been no "overflowed-bacon" business like that of 1873. The actually needy would have been supplied. The relief would not have gone to places remote from water courses and even high up in the hills, but to those who had lost their all by the raging waters.

Some refer to Chattanooga's refusal of aid. So would Montgomery and Selma, so far as the relief of those in their territory were concerned. This city and our neighbor down the river looked after their destitute and sent expeditions to the overflowed districts to relieve those who were suffering. The distress is in the country. It is among a class who are not working by the day or week, and who as soon as the waters subsided received their pay regularly. They have to wait until the seed is planted and the crop harvested before they can see a cent of money with which to buy the necessaries of life. It is for them that the appeal was made, and not for town or city negroes, who have suffered some, but who can supply all their wants as they have heretofore done with their regular wages.

Mr. FORNEY. I yield now to my colleague [Mr. HERBERT].

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORNEY. As much time as my colleague desires.

Mr. HERBERT. This bill, Mr. Chairman, provides that the sum of money to be appropriated shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. It will be expended only for the destitute, if there are any. The gentlemen who have written these articles which have been read at the desk, the editor of The Selma Times and the editor of the Dispatch, are entitled to great respect; but with all due respect to them there are people living in the overflowed districts in Alabama who have been left destitute by this flood. There can be no sort of doubt about it, that though this flood has subsided it has left desolation in its tracks. Fodder, corn, fences, houses, cattle, horses, mules, all have been swept away by a flood absolutely unprecedented in that country—just such a flood as produced the suffering in Ohio which this House voted to relieve, just such a flood as that which occurred on the Mississippi when Congress came to the relief of the sufferers.

Mr. OATES. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. HERBERT. What is the question?

Mr. OATES. Suppose this appropriation made, can it be used to replace any of the mules or horses or other property destroyed? Is it not merely for the relief of the people who are suffering for want of food to eat and clothes to wear?

Mr. HERBERT. This money will be applied to the relief of the destitute, and it is the loss of these things that has left them destitute.

It is argued that the sufferers are all colored people, the employés of white men, and that the landlords have sufficient means to employ them at larger wages and better remuneration than they were getting before. That I understand to be about the substance of the argument of my colleague [Mr. OATES], and it is not a fair statement of the case. The fact is that many of these colored people were in partnership with white men and owned a part of the stock, owned corn and fodder and other property that has been entirely swept away. Others were farming for themselves, mostly on rented lands, and have lost everything they had.

It is not for me, in answer to my colleague's question, to say just in what way it will seem proper to the Secretary of War to set about relieving this distress. The bill proposes that the money shall be voted for the relief of the sufferers, and it is to be put in charge of that officer. He is to see that it is properly applied, and if we have confidence in him that is a sufficient answer at this time to the question of my colleague.

Mr. Chairman, so far as the Constitution is concerned I believe myself in adhering to that instrument; but, sir, when suffering is at my door crying for relief I do not deem it my duty to be more rigid in the construction of the Constitution that John C. Calhoun, the great apostle of strict construction, than John Randolph of Virginia, than Felix Grundy of Tennessee, than Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky, than Nathaniel Macon of North Carolina, than William R. King of Alabama. These men voted (in 1812 I believe it was) to relieve the sufferers by an earthquake in Caracas, in South Armerica, and the bill for the relief of those sufferers was signed by James Madison, who has been called the father of the Constitution.

Mr. OATES. Will my colleague allow me a word in answer to what he has just said?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir; not in answer. I will yield for a question.

Mr. OATES. I will put it in the form of a question, then. Does not my colleague know, as a well-educated State-rights Democrat, that when the Government of the United States deals with other nations or with outside communities it is a nation, and that its action is not controlled by the Constitution, but only by the discretion of Congress and the President? And the instance he cites was an outside instance.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I answer that I do know that there is a difference in this respect and to this extent: that so far as foreign nations are concerned these States and the people of these States constitute but one nation, covered by but one flag; but I do not know of any difference under the Constitution that would justify the expenditure of money for the relief of people abroad and at the same time would inhibit similar relief for our own people at home. Where is the provision of the Constitution which says that this Federal Government, which has the right to go into the States to administer justice, to go into the States to clean out rivers, to go into the States to regulate commerce, to go into the States to tax every citizen of a State, has the right to apply those taxes to the relief of the people in South America and to the relief of the people in Ireland, as was done in 1847, yet has no right to relieve, with those same taxes the suffering people in the State of Alabama?

Mr. OATES. I will answer you.

Mr. HERBERT. I can not see it. There is no distinction. This Government, it is true, is a government of limited powers; the powers not granted to the Federal Government are reserved. It is true the States made no express grant of power to the Federal Government to vote money for charitable objects inside a State, but it is also true that there is no express grant to do such things abroad. There is also the doctrine that we may imply all powers necessarily incident to the granted powers, but, Mr. Chairman, out of this can not come the distinction the gentleman makes, because it is no more necessary that the Federal Government should have the power to do charitable deeds in Ireland than in Alabama.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. Do you believe that Congress has the constitutional power to make this appropriation? If so, under what clause of the Constitution?

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to admit, in answer to my colleague, that if this were an original question I should most unhesitatingly say no. But it is not. The precedent has been set, not only twice in this House since I have been a member of it, but, as I have stated, it was set years ago by great men who are looked upon as apostles and defenders of the Constitution away back in 1812 and again in 1848.

Mr. OATES. Can any number of violations of the Constitution make such action constitutional?

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I will simply rest this constitutional point with those great men whose names I have cited.

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. How may times must the Constitution be violated in order to make the violation right? [Laughter.]

Mr. HERBERT. I leave this constitutional question just there.

Mr. DUNHAM. Do not leave it with me.

Mr. HERBERT. No, I will not leave it with the gentleman; but I leave it with this House. It is a question we have already decided.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I would be glad to be permitted to ask him a question.

Mr. HERBERT. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Chairman, remembering that under precisely similar circumstances Congress came to the relief of the suffering people of my own State and of Arkansas and along the valley of the Ohio River, it would be ungracious on my part to oppose the pending bill. I wish to inquire of the gentleman, however, for information, whether the larger part of the sufferers by the floods in Alabama are colored or white people.

Mr. HERBERT. I think the larger part of them are colored people, but not all; but that makes no difference. I make no appeal for white or for black, but for the destitute—for those who have lost all they possess. I do not care to discuss the constitutional question. The appeal is based on precedents.

Here we are again in the presence of suffering. We have relieved suffering before. Shall we stop now? Shall we draw the line here—draw it at Alabama? Will men who voted for the Ohio River resolution and the Mississippi River resolution draw the line on Alabama?

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of bills under this order has expired; the committee under the rule will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7645) for the relief of the sufferers by the overflow of the rivers in Alabama, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5198) to remove the disabilities of John Taylor Wood, of Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. 5876) for the relief of Dinwiddie B. Phillips.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering, in accordance with the order heretofore made, bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Pending that motion I move that debate on each of the bills in Committee of the Whole be limited to ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Including the reading of the report?

Mr. EDEN. How many of these bills are there?

Mr. DIBBLE. There are about ten bills, scarcely any of them involving any considerable amount of money.

Mr. EDEN. I do not remember the terms of the order. What is the limit as to amount?

Mr. DIBBLE. Twenty-five thousand dollars is the largest amount in any of the bills.

Mr. EDEN. I will insist upon the right to have the report read in any case where it may be desired, without deducting it from the time allowed for debate.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think it would be best to leave this matter to the determination of the Committee of the Whole. I suppose some of these bills will not consume even ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of business from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds under the former order of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. McMILLIN in the chair.

COURT-HOUSE AT KEOKUK, IOWA.

The first business in order was the bill (H. R. 4498) authorizing an additional appropriation of $15,000 for the court-house at Keokuk, Iowa, and to make the same fire-proof.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress approved February 25, 1885, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to purchase a site for a court-house at Keokuk, Iowa, and to erect thereon a building suitable for said purpose, and by an act approved March 3, 1885, there was appropriated the sum of $100,000 for said purpose; and

Whereas said site has been selected and acquired, subject to the conditions of said acts, and the plans and specifications for said building prepared by the Supervising Architect, but said appropriation is insufficient, as shown by said plans, to provide a building of sufficient capacity for the purpose required and complete the same as a fire-proof building: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the further and additional sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to construct and finish said building at Keokuk, Iowa, as a fire-proof building, in accordance with said plans and specifications in the office of the Supervising Architect.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL. I desire to submit an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, strike out "15" and insert "40."

Strike out all after the word "necessary," in line 6, and insert "to enlarge and complete said building and to finish the same as a fire-proof building at Keokuk, Iowa; the sum of $140,000 to be the limit of the cost of said building."

Mr. EDEN. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HALL. I desire to state that this amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] makes a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. EDEN. My point of order is, that under the order of the House the consideration to-day of bills for the erection of public buildings was to be confined to measures in which the appropriation does not exceed $25,000. This amendment proposes to increase the appropriation in this bill beyond the amount limited by order of the House. If the appropriation can be increased in this way to $40,000 it might be increased to a million. It certainly was the intention of the House when this leave was given that no appropriation exceeding $25,000 should be made to-day for any public building. I, for one, would not have consented to this order upon any other condition.

Mr. HALL. I desire the consent of the House to make a statement in opposition to the order, and with a view to asking unanimous consent that this amendment may be considered. In support of that I wish to state the amendment itself is authorized by a letter and request of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is suggested by the Government itself. Before offering the amendment I submitted the facts to the various members constituting the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I understood not one of them personally made objection to it.

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DIBBLE. I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment does not come from the committee.

Mr. HALL. That is correct, and if the House will indulge me for a moment I will explain the exact circumstances. This bill originally appropriated $15,000 to construct this building, and as a fire-proof building was required there, the committeee reported it back favorably. On the morning that committee first obtained the floor of the House for the consideration of bills thus reported a letter was presented, by my hands, from the Secretary of the Treasury suggesting, owing to the space required by the Government, the appropriation was insufficient, and that $40,000 instead of $15,000 should be fixed as the amount. With the permission of the committee I will ask the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be read for the information of the House.

Mr. EDEN. Has the point of order been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing is in order now, except by consent, but debate on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa can withhold the reading of the communication until the point of order has first been disposed of.

Mr. EDEN. The question as to whether it is important the appropriation should be increased beyond the amount limited for consideration in to-day's session is not a matter before us at this time. If this is a case requiring a larger sum than $25,000 let it be considered at some other time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I suggest to my colleague that he modify his amendment so as to make the sum $25,000 and take the chance of having it increased to a proper amount in the Senate for the construction of this public building. I concede he ought to have $40,000, and if he does not get it because of these complications it is not his fault, but it can be made all right in the Senate.

Mr. HALL. I do not understand this bill is not within the order of the House. That order covered the bills reported from the committee not exceeding in amount $25,000. This was reported for $15,000. Now, it is impossible to proceed with the consideration of any bill unless that bill is open to the ordinary amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the special order under which the committee is sitting.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 17, 1886, after the morning hour for consideration of bills reported from committees, be fixed for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds as involve no expenditure from the Treasury or an expenditure not exceeding $25,000 in any one bill, not to interfere with prior special orders or general revenue or appropriation bills; but if displaced by such, then to continue a special order for each Saturday thereafter until consideration of such bills be had.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be observed that the order under which the committee is in session limits the amount of the appropriation in the bill to be considered. But it does not, the Chair thinks, in the action it shall take upon the bill after consideration has been entered upon.

It may be true that those who consented to this rule thought the committee, even in amendments, would be governed by the limit fixed as to the amount of appropriation in the bills to be considered. However the Chair may be inclined to hold that way, it is constrained to hold the limitation is in the amount that shall be embraced in the bill as a prerequisite to its consideration, and that the Committee of the Whole is not limited in the method of disposing of a bill or the amount they shall add to it after its consideration has been entered upon.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, if, under the unanimous consent granted the other day, members believed we would be called upon to consider bills beyond the limit of the amount of appropriation then agreed upon, that consent never would have been granted. So believing, if in order, I now move the bill and amendment be recommitted to the committee. I believe it is a clear violation of the intention of the House in granting unanimous consent for to-day's sitting.

Mr. HALL. I wish to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. As this is a new question, the Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HALL. I do not wish to put the committee or any members of the House who were instrumental in procuring the order for to-day in any condition of bad faith, and I therefore will ask leave to withdraw my amendment. I supposed, in view of the fact it had been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, I would have unanimous consent to its being acted upon, and I ask that I shall have unanimous consent for its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds, and thinks it well to state it again as there seems to be some misunderstanding, that the amendment offered is in order, but in view of the feeling in the House the gentleman who offered it can take such course as he sees proper.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have an opportunity of being heard for a moment upon this point. In the Forty-eighth Congress we passed a bill appropriating $95,000 for the construction of a public building in the city of Keokuk. They then went to work under the appropriation and bought the ground, and the plans and specifications were prepared for the erection of a building which was not contemplated to be fire-proof.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended, however, that it should be made fire-proof, for the reason that the Government ought not to put up a building that is not fire-proof; and hence my friend got into this trouble over his bill. He got some understanding, by some means or other, that an increase of $15,000 would accomplish the object that the Secretary of the Treasury had in view—that is, to make it a fire-proof building; but after the bill was reported the Secretary of the Treasury sent, I own, a letter to the committee stating that $15,000 would be insufficient, and that it would require an appropriation of $40,000 to do this work; and if there is any objection to the bill passing with that increase, which ought to be put into it, while this is right close to my district and my people are interested in it, I would suggest that he offer an amendment to increase it to $25,000, the limit fixed by the order of the House, although I think it is right and proper that we should appropriate the $40,000. However, if that can not be done, I would suggest to him that he take the $25,000.

Mr. REAGAN. If it could be understood that this action shall not be taken as a precedent for the increase to an indefinite amount to other bills which may be presented to-day, and if this might be considered by unanimous consent, I should not interpose any objection to the increase with that understanding.

Mr. NEECE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that this increase be allowed to come up for consideration in the committee. This is not in my district, but it is a matter of importance. I know the necessity for it, and this amendment by unanimous consent, as the gentleman from Texas suggests, can be considered in this case, but with the understanding that objection shall be made to any such increase hereafter I myself will interpose an objection if no one else does.

Mr. EDEN. I shall not give unanimous consent to this increase.

Mr. NEECE. I do not understand that it will be necessary to ask unanimous consent to consider it under the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. EDEN. I certainly will not give consent.

Mr. NEECE. Then let us take a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Iowa, desiring to accommodate the feelings of the committee, indicated his purpose to withdraw the amendment if there was objection made to its consideration. The Chair understands that there is objection.

Mr. EDEN. I object to it.

Mr. HALL. Then I ask to withdraw the amendment fixing the amount at $40,000.

Mr. NEECE. No, I hope that will not be done; let it stand at $40,000. I understand that consent will be given if this is the only case of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. But objection is made.

Mr. NEECE. I thought the objection would not be made if it was insisted that this case was to be considered as an exceptional one, and the same rule was not to be allowed in reference to the other bills.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. My point of order is that this is now considered under the five-minute rule, and that the five minutes have been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HALL. I withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is on the bill as reported from the committee.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, if I can be recognized, I desire to renew the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, for as I think it is an eminently proper one, and if I can have the attention of the committee for a moment I believe they will agree with me. This is an isolated case, and it is very important that this building should be made fire-proof. The amount asked is very moderate; and I do not think there is any other bill to be considered to-day where such an amendment will be offered.

Mr. EDEN. But it ought not to come in by practicing a deceit upon the House.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I submit the case in that respect; and if any other amendment should come in on another bill, this being considered an isolated case by consent, there would be opposition to it. I myself should oppose it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let us have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Under the special order limiting bills to be considered to-day to $25,000, is it in order to amend and pass a bill above that amount?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in response to the point of order suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, that the same point was made when the amendment was first offered. The Chair held then, as it now holds, that it is not in order to enter upon the consideration of a bill carrying an appropriation of more than $25,000, the limitation in the order of the House being simply as to the consideration. But the Chair holds that this does not prevent the committee from amending above that amount if they see proper.

Mr. HAMMOND. I was temporarily absent, and did not know that the question had been raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON].

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 35, noes 13.

Mr. EDEN and Mr. HAMMOND made the point that no quorum had voted.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. If in order I shall withdraw the amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HAMMOND. I did not object to the amount of the bill, but I made the point, my purpose being to confine this business to the limit as understood by the House.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Chairman, I now move to amend the bill by striking out "$15,000" and inserting "$25,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN DALLAS, TEX.

The next business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 2410) for the addition of a third story to the public building in Dallas, Tex.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Supervising Architect of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to add a third story to the public building in the city of Dallas, Tex.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose named in the preceding section there be, and hereby is, appropriated the sum of $25,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommended the following amendment:

In line 3, strike out the words "Supervising Architect" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Secretary."

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN].

Mr. WELLBORN. I have nothing to say in support of this bill further than to ask the reading of the report. The report gives a clear statement of the reasons for the proposed legislation, and I believe will be satisfactory to every member of the House.

The report (by Mr. DIBBLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2410) for the addition of a third story to the public building at Dallas, Tex., having considered the same, submit the following report:

The bill authorizing the erection of this building was enacted into law some four years ago, the amount of the appropriation being $75,000. The Supervising Architect designed a building within this limit, plain and without ornamentation, and began its erection some twelve or eighteen months ago. During the Forty-seventh Congress $25,000 was added to the original appropriation for the purpose of having the building of fire-proof construction. The walls are now finished up to or near the second story, and this bill is for the addition of a third story. The needs of the public service in Dallas imperatively demand this enlargement. The building is small, being 55 by 84 feet. The post-office will occupy the first floor, while the second floor is designed for the uses of the United States courts. The first floor is barely sufficient to meet the present demands of the postal service, while the second floor is wholly inadequate to the uses for which it is contemplated.

The dimensions of the court-room, as planned, are but 25 by 46 feet, and even the reduction of the court-room to these small and contracted proportions does not leave sufficient space for the necessary offices pertaining to the court, while no provision is made for the office of deputy collector of internal revenue.

Dallas is one of the most important cities in Texas, both in the number of its inhabitants and the extent of its commerce.

The territory within the municipality is quite limited, being only 1½ miles square. The population within the municipality is about 15,000. Immediately contiguous to these chartered limits, however, and in reality a part of Dallas for all practical business purposes, is a population estimated at 10,000.

Since the construction of the building was authorized, some four years ago, the gross revenues of the post-office have increased from $30,201.29 to about $42,000, the latter amount being the revenues for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and are largely and rapidly increasing. The post-office has the free-delivery system, with ten carriers.

Dallas has five railroads, and is the point of intersection of the two great trunk lines, one from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, and the other from the great lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

United States courts are held at Dallas. The court was established some six years ago; its business has assumed large proportions.

Without any reference to the future rapid growth of Dallas, which will require enlarged accommodations, the capacity of the building, as designed, is wholly inadequate to the pressing needs of the public service. The addition of a third story is an urgent necessity.

The committee report back the bill and recommend its passage with the following amendment: In third line of first section strike out the words "Supervising Architect" and insert in lieu of them the word "Secretary."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FRANKFORT, KY.

The next business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 868) appropriating money for the completion of the public building at Frankfort, Ky.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $15,000 be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the public building at Frankfort, Ky.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. This is an appropriation to complete a building that is almost completed. The necessity for it arises mainly out of the bankruptcy of the contractor who originally contracted to construct the building. Unless some member desires the report to be read, I will merely state there is in the report a letter from the Supervising Architect showing that the amount the committee has reported is recommended by the Supervising Architect and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would state there is $7,000 which is to go to the surplus fund, an unexpended balance of an appropriation which has been given heretofore; $7,000 go back, and we give $15,000, which just completes the building.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The next business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 6980) making an appropriation to complete the public building at Jackson, Tenn., and to reappropriate an unexpended balance therefor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That for the completion of the public building for a court-house and post-office at Jackson, Tenn., there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,000, together with an unexpended balance of $2,525.25 appropriated by the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1885, for the approaches, grading, fencing, and paving for said building.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I have no disposition to take up the time of the House in discussing this proposition. The public building at Jackson is almost completed, and only requires the additional sum of $10,000 for its completion. The committee in their bill report $9,500. That is the amount we ask. Unless some gentleman desires the report to be read I will move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES GROUNDS IN CHATTANOOGA.

The next business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 7467) to grant for the use of the public a street across the United States grounds in the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there is granted to the city of Chattanooga and county of Hamilton, in the State of Tennessee, for the use of the public, a street or roadway, 60 feet in width and about 860 feet in length, to be located, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, over and across the lands of the United States reservation in the city of Chattanooga, formerly occupied for barracks and parade-ground, extending from the Western and Atlantic Railroad on the north to and connecting with what is known as Hooke street, and thence about 800 feet southward over said Hooke street to Montgomery avenue; but this grant is made upon condition that the city of Chattanooga shall construct and keep in repair a good road on the proposed line, equal to that which the United States Government constructed connecting the city with the national cemetery.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DIBBLE. I believe those are all of the bills that are in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. There is one that, by inadvertence, went on the Private Calendar. If the Chair rules it is in order to call that up now I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair observes that the order does not impose a limit as to the Calendar to which the committee can go. The gentleman, therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, can move to take up the bill if it is within the limit prescribed by the order.

CARROLLTON ROAD COMPANY, KENTUCKY.

Mr. DIBBLE. Under the ruling of the Chair I call up the bill (H. R. 4503) to authorize the Secretary of War to permit the Carrollton and Lock No. 1 Turnpike Road Company to locate and construct its road on land belonging to the United States at lock No. 1, on the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to permit the Carrollton and Lock No. 1 Turnpike Road Company to locate and construct its road through the land belonging to the United States at lock No. 1, on the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky, upon such terms and conditions as he may consider proper: Provided, That said road shall not be so located or constructed as to obstruct the use of the said land by the United States for public purposes.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this land which belongs to the United States in connection with the work of improvement on the river?

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes, sir. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to give an explanation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire any further explanation?

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is that land, I am satisfied.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the committee rise and report the various bills which have been acted upon to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration various bills, had instructed him to report them back to the House with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill (H. R. 4498) authorizing an additional appropriation of $15,000 for the court-house at Keokuk, Iowa, to make the same fire-proof, was reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with the following amendment:

In the fifth line of the bill strike out "$15,000" and insert "$25,000."

Mr. HALL. I desire to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment changing this bill to an appropriation for $40,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move to amend the title so as to make it conform to the body of the bill as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 2410) for the addition of a third story to the public building in Dallas, Tex. The committee proposed to amend in the third line by striking out the words "Supervising Architect" and inserting the word "Secretary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 864) appropriating money for the completion of the public building at Frankfort, Ky.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 6980) making appropriation to complete the public building at Jackson, Tenn., and reappropriate an unexpended balance therefor.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 7467) to grant for the use of the public a street across the United States grounds in the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4503) to authorize the Secretary of War to permit the Carrollton and Lock No. 1 Turnpike Road Company to locate and construct its road on land belonging to the United States at lock No. 1 on the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Private Calendar; but if there be no objection the Committee of the Whole House will be discharged from its further consideration, and the bill will be considered in the House.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I now call up Senate bill No. 481, authorizing the partition of certain land in Louisville, Ky., belonging jointly to John Echols and the Government of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas a tract of ground situated in Louisville, Ky., adjoining the Louisville and Portland Canal, and known as "Rowan's Basin," is owned by the United States of America and by John Echols in the following proportion and under the following conveyances, to wit: The United States, as the proprietor of the Louisville and Portland Canal and the owner of all the stock of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, owns an undivided three-eighths of said real estate by virtue of the following deeds: One from R. H. Campbell and others to the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, recorded in deed-book numbered 135, page 423, and one from George H. Douglas to said canal company, recorded in deed-book numbered 137, page 402, both in the Jefferson County (Kentucky) clerk's office; and said John Echols owns an undivided five-eighths of said real estate under and by virtue of the following deeds to him, to wit: One from Eliza H. Boone and others, recorded in deed-book numbered 255, page 134; one from Rebecca B. Rowan, trustee, and others, recorded in deed-book numbered 254, page 382; one from Rowan Buchanan and others, recorded in deed-book numbered 254, page 362, and one from Samuel J. Broadwell and others, recorded in deed-book numbered 254, page 602, all in the Jefferson County (Kentucky) clerk's office; and it is to the interest of both parties that partition shall be made of said real estate: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to agree with said Echols, his heirs or his assigns, upon such partition of said real estate as may seem to the Secretary of War to be just and proper, and may, in the name of and on behalf of the United States of America, make, execute, and deliver to said Echols, his heirs or his assigns, and receive from him or them, such deed of conveyance as many effectuate the partition herein provided for.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been very fully considered. It was considered in the last Congress, and it passed the Senate. It then came to the House, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the last Congress, and was unanimously reported by that committee, but failed to pass because it was not reached on the Calendar. In this Congress it was unanimously passed by the committee and by the Senate, and it comes back an act—the act that is now before the House. It has also been unanimously reported by the present Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The bill simply proposes to partition between the Government and Mr. Echols certain property lying near the canal basin in Louisville, Ky. The United States attorney reports that it is to the interest of the Government to make this partition.

The Government has no use for that part of the property which Mr. Echols has, and Mr. Echols has no use for that part which ought to belong to the United States, and it is to the interest of both parties that this partition should be made. Unless some gentleman desires to ask a question, I will submit the bill upon this statement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CANAL BASIN, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up House bill No. 4927.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported a substitute for that bill, and that the original bill was laid on the table. The substitute is pending; its number is 7892.

The bill (H. R. 7892) authorizing the use of the Louisville and Portland Canal basin upon certain conditions was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the written contract made and entered into by and between the city of Louisville and the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and the written contract by and between the city of Louisville, the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and John P. Byrne, under which the firm of Byrne & Speed, of Louisville, Ky., has constructed a basin on the south side of the Louisville and Portland Canal, above Fifteenth street, and has also erected buildings, with elevator machinery therein, on land then the property of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, now the property of the United States, are ratified and confirmed, subject, however, to the following modifications and provisions, to wit: Byrne & Speed, their assignees and grantees, are hereafter to pay to the United States of America, for the use of the land, an annual rental of $250, to be paid semi-annually, through the officer in charge of the canal, to the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the public interests require the vacation of the Government land now occupied by the firm of Byrne & Speed, the Secretary of War shall give to the said firm of Byrne & Speed, their assignees or grantees, at least six months' notice to vacate the premises in question, and thereupon the aforesaid premises shall be vacated within such time; and no claim for damages or costs of any description shall lie against the United States.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN]. The firm of Byrne & Speed, under a contract with the old Portland and Louisville Canal Company, had the right to use a portion of the canal basin for elevator purposes. They presented a bill to this House in which they asked Congress to confirm them in the right, and to say that when they were required to remove certain damages should be allowed to them, and also that a certain notice should be given them of the expiration of their user. The Engineer Department do not agree to that. They say that there ought to be no damages allowed when the Government calls upon this firm to surrender its use, and they say also that something ought to be paid for the use of these elevator privileges, and upon that suggestion the bill has been amended.

I do not know that the bill in its present form meets with the favor of Byrne & Speed, but I accept it as the result of the committee's investigation and the suggestions of the Department. It requires that this firm shall pay $250 per annum rental, and shall remove upon six months' notice, and that when they do remove they shall receive no damages whatever because of removal. The committee have reported back the bill in this form, and while it probably is not what Mr. Speed wants, I think it is the best that can be obtained, and I trust the bill will pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend please explain the origin of this right? Was there a lease or contract between these parties and the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and was there any rent paid?

Mr. WILLIS. Probably the best answer to the gentleman will be to refer to the report of Colonel Merrill, the engineer in charge. I read from a communication of the Chief of Engineers, dated March 3, 1886:

Hon. WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by reference to this office, of the letter of Hon. C. P. Snyder, of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, dated the 16th ultimo, inclosing, for views of the War Department, H. R. 4927, a bill "authorizing the use of the Louisville and Portland Canal basin upon certain conditions"—

That is the original bill, which the committee has amended—and to state that it was referred to Lieut. Col. W. E. Merrill, Corps of Engineers, who reports thereon as follows, under date of February 23, 1886:

"Respectfully returned to the Chief of Engineers.

"I would recommend that in line 17, page 2, the words 'two hundred and fifty' be inserted in the blank space, and that the whole of section 2 be stricken out.

That refers to section 2 of the original bill. The $250 is for rental.

"I have always maintained that Byrne & Speed have obtained possession of the property in question without consideration, and that they are merely tenants at will of the United States. Under these circumstances, I can not see any justice in requiring the United States to pay a large sum, or any sum whatever, in the event of its being found necessary to remove them from the tract which, in my opinion, they now occupy without legal authorization. I think, however, that it would be but just to guarantee them six months' notice in case they should be required to vacate the premises.

"A similar bill was introduced into the last Congress upon which I made a like report.

"I would therefore recommend a new section 2, to read:

"'SEC. 2. That when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the public interest requires the vacation of the Government land now occupied by the firm of Byrne & Speed, the Secretary of War shall give to the said Byrne & Speed, their assignees or grantees, at least six months' notice to vacate the premises in question, and thereupon the aforesaid premises shall be vacated within such time, and no claim for damages or costs of any description shall lie against the United States.'

That is the second section as now in the bill.

"In this connection I would refer to previous reports from this office." * * *

I beg also to inclose a copy of a report of Colonel Merrill on a bill of the same purport (H. R. 7891, Forty-eighth Congress, second session), introduced in the last Congress. His views and recommendations are concurred in by this office.

The letter of Hon. C. P. Snyder is herewith respectfully returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN NEWTON,
Chief of Engineers, Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not raise any further question. Colonel Merrill is an entirely reliable gentleman, and thoroughly competent to act on such a subject. I had supposed, however, that originally some rent was reserved; but it seems such was not the case.

Mr. WILLIS. There was no rent reserved. This bill proposes to give the Government $250 rent for property which has been occupied without the payment of any rent.

Mr. HOLMAN. Colonel Merrill, I think, is one of the best officers in that service.

Mr. WILLIS. Unless there be some further question, I ask a vote on the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. DIBBLE. I now call up the bill (H. R. 6873) relating to the construction of public buildings.

The SPEAKER. This bill appears to be in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DIBBLE. It contains no appropriation nor anything that can call for an appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. It ought to be on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair on examining the bill finds that it seems to embrace restrictions on the Secretary of the Treasury and contains no appropriation. It was reported late yesterday afternoon at the moment of adjournment, and was erroneously referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection to discharging that committee from its further consideration?

Mr. BAYNE. I reserve points of order till we understand what the bill is.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter no plan shall be prepared or approved by the Secretary of the Treasury for any public building authorized by Congress to be erected until after the site therefor shall have been purchased and paid for; and he shall not authorize or approve of any plan for any such building which shall involve a greater expenditure in the completion of such building and approaches thereto than the amount that shall remain of the sum specified in the law authorizing the erection of such building as the limit of the cost of the site and building after the site shall have been paid for.

SEC. 2. That hereafter the United States shall not be responsible for or chargeable with any expense attending the paving or repaving of any streets surrounding or adjacent to any public building constructed by the United States outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYNE. I have no objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be considered in the House. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, this bill, which was introduced by myself and has been favorably reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, has only two objects. It is the result of experience in connection with our appropriations for public buildings. Its object, in the first place, is that the limitation on the cost of these buildings should always include the expense of the approaches. Sometimes where a building has been authorized at an expenditure of, for instance, $50,000, there has subsequently been called for a further expenditure of $10,000 for approaches of the building. The expense or these approaches has in many cases been excessively disproportionate to the original limit of the cost of the building—about 20 per cent. in some instances.

The second section of the bill speaks for itself. It is designed to avoid any responsibility on the part of the Government for the cost of paving or repaving the streets and carriage-ways around public buildings.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. On the very point now suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania I would like some explanation from that gentleman, who I understand introduced this bill, or from the committee. In making this inquiry I have no particular building in view, but am speaking upon general principles. If the Government owns a building surrounded by public streets, those streets must be paved; and if paved, by whom?

Mr. RANDALL. In the original dedication in almost every instance where the Government of the United States accepts property it does so upon the express stipulation the property ceded to the Government shall be free from taxation or other charge. Yet, sir, there has been in this House constant controversies on this subject. And it will be remembered the Committee on Appropriations have always resisted, when their attention has been called to it, this mode of compelling the Government indirectly to submit to taxation of this sort.

There is not a city or a town in the United States which secures a public building that is not greatly benefited by such construction. It never was in contemplation, I think, the Government of the United States should pay in addition these sums which have now come to be a very serious charge in the aggregate. In the estimates for this year we have $11,000 asked of the United States for this character of expenditure.

Mr. LONG. Let me ask the gentleman, perhaps in furtherance of his argument, what is the rule in regard to county and State buildings in a city?

Mr. RANDALL. The same rule, so far as I know. I would not like to state, as a general proposition, that in all instances such is the case; but the gentleman knows, having been the governor of a great commonwealth, that such is the practice in his State.

Mr. LONG. And the same rule should apply to the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; the same rule should apply to the Federal Government.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. In my own city of Chicago the question will never become a practical one, because the streets around the public building or half of the streets next to the public building have been solidly paved with granite. But I can readily imagine there may be a city where this would apply. This bill prohibits Congress from appropriating hereafter for the pavement of a street.

Mr. RANDALL. As I have said, in the original dedication to the Government it has been with the express understanding the property was to be ceded free of all tax or other charge.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is, the Government shall refuse to pave the street. The question is whether we will pass a law prohibiting Congress from paving a street hereafter.

Mr. RANDALL. I have been confronted with appropriation acts which have made appropriations for this character of work, charged against the Federal Government by the municipality wherein the public building is located.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. But the gentleman has always held the right of a State to tax the property of the United States is invalid.

Mr. RANDALL. I certainly hold it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. And then the gentleman from Pennsylvania having the law at his back, and having considerable moral courage to support him to resist such appropriations when he sees fit, the question is why we should pass a law compelling Congress to agree to refuse hereafter.

Mr. RANDALL. Congress has occasionally thought otherwise.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, because I happen to know a case in which such a payment is needed I would oppose that section. It is in the city in which I live. We donated seventy-odd thousand dollars' worth of land to the United States upon which to erect a public building. It put up a public building costing some $200,000. They are exempt from taxation, that building and the ground upon which it stands.

But the city of Atlanta chose to have courts there. They would have been there anyhow. The United States accepted the donation of the land in the particular locality because it was tendered to them, and taken as naturally as water takes its level. [Laughter.]

The court had been held in a small town some 16 miles away. It was moved to Atlanta and held in a rented building, and a new courthouse had to be built in Atlanta.

We can not tax land under the Constitution of Georgia for the improvement of streets unless we tax all property uniformly; but, under the exceptions which have been made throughout the United States, the improvement of streets around public buildings is not regarded in the nature of a tax or within the constitutional prohibition.

Land-owners in that city have been assessed to pave the various streets with Belgian blocks and other material. Upon the streets around this public building Belgian blocks have been laid.

At one point the present capitol of the State faces this public building. The State has paid its quota, as a private owner of property at that point would have done, and the city has paid its share. But the United States has not paid its quota, and we are asking now to have it paid by a bill, pending, I believe, in the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether the grant of land made by the city of Atlanta was not made to the Federal Government because the Federal Government proposed to build thereon a public building which would greatly add to the convenience of the court and the public officials, as well as to the general ornamentation of the city; and whether the grant itself did not contain the clause to which I have already alluded, that the Government of the United States should be free thereafter from all taxes or charge of any kind?

Mr. HAMMOND. I will answer both questions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as well as I can. It is impossible for me to know what were the motives of those who gave this land to the United States. I was not one of them.

I suppose one motive was to get some work—to build the house. I suppose the adjacent land-owners anticipated thereby an increased value of their property; but what may have been the views of the mayor and common council of that municipality who voted the donation I do not know. One thing I do know, they gave away $70,000 for something that I think we would have gained without the expenditure of the $70,000. That is my opinion. But whether true or not that the United States takes the property with a condition of perpetual exemption from taxes, grant for the sake of argument, and I do not know it to be true, but grant for the sake of argument that we agreed it should not be taxed. If this is not a tax—and the books lay down that it is not—if this is not a tax, then the United States, if it made the acceptance with a critical examination of the gift, understood it was not to be relieved from its share of this charge.

Mr. RANDALL. On the contrary——

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, on the contrary; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no more right to determine what the United States understood than I have.

Mr. RANDALL. No; but the dedication itself shows.

Mr. HAMMOND. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania ever read the dedication?

Mr. RANDALL. I have examined numbers of them, and believe, as far as I have examined them, that they are uniformly alike. We had this matter discussed in the last Congress.

Mr. HAMMOND. I have never read one of them in my life, and I do not suppose there is a gentleman here upon this floor who can repeat ten words consecutively contained in any one of them.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a matter of record; the gentleman may have been absent or his memory may have failed him.

Mr. HAMMOND. Both of which are possible.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; because this matter was fully discussed before this House in the gentleman's presence.

Mr. HAMMOND. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that the Federal Government can be taxed by a State, or that it can be made to pay an assessment for street improvements. I know that it can not be. I simply meant to second the idea of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], that as the game is all in our own hands, there is no use of throwing up this barrier or saying by law that we shall never hereafter even make an exception in any particular case.

I have been talking about two main streets on the front and end of this building. To show you to what a ridiculous extent these restrictions may go, there is behind this public building an alley of 9 feet width.

I believe it was given half by the adjoining land-owner and one-half by the United States when this building was put up to make a joint alley between the two. The adjoining land-owner is willing to put macadam or Belgian blocks on his side of the alley, which runs clear across the square in the rear of this public building. He is willing to put it down at his own expense on his own property, but not on that of the Government; but the United States is too poor to put down its share of it; and consequently that alley remains unpaved and is a mere mud-hole, through which all the mails are carried, and you can not go to the house in the rear with any degree of comfort or convenience by reason of the state of affairs there.

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me a moment?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRISON. I wish to say that I do not know which side I am on, because this is a question I do not clearly understand. If I am correctly informed, we are going to pass a law now which will prevent the State or citizen from presenting claims against the Government for expenditures of the character suggested here and will also prevent us from paying them. Now I want to know from the gentleman from Georgia, or somebody else who can tell, for I do not know how we can prevent these claims from being presented, or, in case they are presented, how we can prevent the next House from paying them.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will answer that by saying that the city of Atlanta, I believe, under the Constitution, has the right of petition, but if it has not, its citizens have; and therefore you can not prevent their coming here. This law, if you pass it, simply reads thus:

That hereafter the United States shall not be responsible for, or chargeable with, any expense attending the paving or repaving of any streets surrounding, or adjacent to, any public building constructed by the United States, outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRISON. It is not responsible now.

Mr. HAMMOND. It is not chargeable now to the Government unless Congress makes it so. That is just what I say. It is not responsible now; it is not chargeable now; this is to put an obstacle in the way of these claims, and for what purpose?

Mr. RANDALL. It would be in the nature of a notice that the United States ought not to pay anything outside of what was stipulated when the deed of grant was made.

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not mean to be disrespectful, but I will say I consider it a piece of impertinence for this Congress to serve notice on future Congresses as to whether they should pay for the improvement of streets around buildings belonging to the United States.

Let us look at the other side of this thing. Here was a street between the capitol of the State of Georgia and this public building, 70 feet wide, that needed a good macadam or something of that kind. We put down Belgian block to make it good. Suppose it had been known in advance that the United States was bound by a law never to contribute to making that street, and suppose Atlanta was as niggardly as it is proposed the United States shall make itself on the statute-book to-day, the approach to your building would have been left just as it was before perhaps, an eye-sore to the community—disagreeable to us and disagreeable to the United States so far as approaching this building was concerned. It would have been a nuisance.

Now, the United States can never be asked to pay anything more than its proper proportion for the fixing of a street; it could never be made to pay a dime without a majority vote of both Houses of Congress and the signature of the President of the United States to the act that required the payment. And for us to undertake to say that we are going to determine in advance that there shall never be any improvement made on the streets opposite public buildings unless the city itself will pay for those improvements seems to me to be wrong. It is unnecessary.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] talked as if a little town could slip up on the United States and get its hand into the Treasury whether it was unlocked or not. We have the key; the future Congresses will hold the treasure of the Government. To undertake to save in this way is saving at the spigot when the bung-hole is open all the time.

Mr. RANDALL. It may be impertinent for the Government of the United States to stand upon the rights which were given to it when the property was handed over by the municipality or State; or it may be niggardly. But there is one thing certain, this would prevent the extraordinary spectacle of the United States being a tax-payer all over this Union, when every one of these public buildings was erected for the convenience of the people of the State and the locality; and there is not an instance where, in my judgment, if the Government of the United States had said, "We will construct the building provided you supply a lot for that object," the lot would not have been given. We have had experience of this thing, and this House voted by an enormous majority—a vote of two-thirds—that they were unwilling to pay this kind of taxation.

Mr. HAMMOND. Can not they do it again?

Mr. RANDALL. Never mind; you are through.

The other body thought otherwise, and the bill went to a committee of conference. We were compelled to yield or let the bill fail. That was the spectacle that was presented, and the object of this bill is to prevent that or provide a remedy in the future.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will this second section prevent it?

Mr. RANDALL. It is notice to all hands, and it is a restriction on the Supervising Architect.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then let it read "and the country is hereby notified that hereafter we do not want to do this."

Mr. RANDALL. When this is a growing evil in every part of the country, and claims are coming in as they are this year for the payment of these expenses, I think it is time to meet it by some sort of notice that will prevent it. I care nothing, however, about it personally. If the House does not want to pass this it need not.

Mr. BLOUNT. The question ot whether or not the Federal Government shall contribute a proportionate share to the expense of improving streets is not a new one in Congress. It has been raised by various gentlemen at different sessions of Congress ever since I have been a member, and the claim has been uniformly rejected. I remember a case from Indiana in which the special plea was made that the Government should pay a proportion of the expense of paving the street. The circumstances were that they were inhibited from raising beyond a given rate of taxation; that the public building was on a great thoroughfare of the city, the most important street, and that unless Congress paid its proportion the citizens of that city would be subject to the inconvenience of not having that street paved. Such special reasons as these have attended most of the applications I have known made to Congress for aid in the construction of streets, and, as I have said, the claim has been uniformly rejected.

I see no objection to placing in this bill a declaration on the part of Congress in conformity with its uniform practice on the subject. As suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], the public buildings themselves were placed where they are largely for the convenience of the public. The streets passing and adjoining them are used for the business of the city largely, almost wholly.

The little access that becomes necessary for the Government to have to the public building for handling mails, &c., is but a small part of the use of those streets. It seems to me, therefore, there can be no objection to this declaration. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, it is notice to the several cities of this Union where these building have been constructed and are to be constructed that the Government does not contemplate any more than furnishing convenient buildings for the purposes of the Goverament. And I trust, sir, that we shall never have to be involved with the various cities in this Union in struggles on this floor on ex parte statements with respect to the cost of streets.

There is nothing in the nature of the case or in the relation of these buildings to the communities where they are located to justify those communities in asking the Government to bear this expense. Of course they will make such applications. The right of petition, as has been suggested, exists, and they will come with unreasonable demands. But while we are lavishly providing for expenditures on public buildings, it is a fit time to couple with such expenditures an express declaration that we will do nothing more more than what is legitimate.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the Government of the United States has any voice whatever in determining the necessity of this taxation for street improvements, or the method of its expenditure?

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman's question carries its answer with it. The improvement of streets is a local matter, intended for the benefit of the community in its business intercourse.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether it is not true that in quite a number of cases cities where the Government owned considerable real estate have made street improvements for which, so far as the Government was concerned, there was no necessity. The bills in such cases, I admit, have not generally been allowed by us, yet they have been pressed upon Congress, and will undoubtedly be ultimately paid unless it is understood as a rule that the Government does not pay any portion of the cost of constructing or repairing streets.

Mr. BLOUNT. I not only think it probable such has been the fact, but there are a great many cases all over the United States where the Government has constructed buildings and where pavements have been laid at the expense of the localities without any question being raised as to the propriety of the Government bearing that expense; and if we should adopt the policy of sharing these expenditures with the different cities, it would be but natural that we should not only contribute to such expenditures in the future, but, as an equitable obligation, go back and pay our pro rata share where the expenditures have been already incurred.

Mr. BYNUM. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman alluded to a case in Indiana. Now, in that State these improvements are held to be an improvement of the particular property, not a general tax, and in the case to which the gentleman alluded, the pavement around the Indianapolis post-office——

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not allude to the Indianapolis post-office.

Mr. HOLMAN. The arsenal grounds.

Mr. BYNUM. I was about to say that in the case of the improvement around the Indianapolis post-office, although the contract is made by the city, the city is not liable, but the particular property is chargeable with the expense. The city can not be held liable; and the man who did that work is without his money for one-fourth of the improvement.

Mr. BLOUNT. The man never had any claim against the Government of the United States for it. The Government has uniformly declined to make compensation in such cases; and if the contractor, in the face of the policy of the Government and in the face of the plain justice of the case, has gone on and made a bad bargain with the authorities in reference to street improvements, that is his misfortune. While it may be true that each citizen should be required to contribute in reference to the amount of his property, the same consideration does not apply to the Government of the United States, which has but little occasion to use these streets, and has no voice or vote or influence in determining whether there shall be local improvements or what shall be their character.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it has been asserted here that this is a question of taxation. Now, in some parts of the country it may be so; but it is not so in Illinois. I infer it is not so in Georgia or Indiana. In Illinois, and I believe in these other States, when a street is improved it is improved at the expense of adjoining owners. Therefore when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says that in the grant of property to the Government there was an agreement that the United States should be exempt from the burden of taxation, if he applies that to this particular case he must mean that there was an implied understanding that where there is a Government building the citizens owning adjoining property shall pave the whole width of the street, or else that half of the street which bounds any Government building shall not be paved at all.

Mr. RANDALL. The deeds in such cases provide that the Government shall be exempt from all taxation for such purposes.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. But the citizen who owns property opposite a Government building is not a party to such a deed; and the question is simply whether the street shall be improved or whether it shall not be improved? The question is not whether it shall not be improved by the State or the city, because in my own State and in Georgia, Indiana, and perhaps other States, it can not be so improved.

Mr. RANDALL. The State makes laws governing her citizens and governing all contracts.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I do not say that the United States Government is bound by any law or ordinance of any city or any State. The question is whether the Appropriations Committee, whose duty it is to consider every case on its own merits, shall get this provision on the statute-book, and thereafter decline to consider any such question that shall hereafter arise.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know under what circumstances and by what authority the Committee on Appropriations, even without a law of this kind, would place upon an appropriation bill any provision for paying expenses of paving in front of public buildings in any part of this country?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I can not answer that question——

Mr. BLOUNT. It has always been held on questions of order that there was no authority to insert such provisions in an appropriation bill, and they have always been ruled out.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is not the question before the House, but whether that committee shall be enabled to put a certain provision of this kind on the statute-book.

I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], who I believe desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to amend by striking out the second section of the bill. My object in this motion is simply to prevent what seems to me a useless and, if for no other reason, a mischievous proposition from being put into the form of a statute.

Everybody admits that the mere declaration that the United States shall not be subject to any such charge will not prevent anybody from asking payment and will not prevent payment, and therefore it is useless. The United States are not subject to such charge now. They never can be made subject to such charge in future except by their consent; but this Congress can not bind any future Congress not to make such a concession. Whenever anything is suggested on the score of taxation or charges the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] adds another word to the deed. I never saw one of those deeds, but I am very much like Mr. Petigru, of South Carolina, on an occasion when somebody was bothering him about the "decree of Providence;" he simply said, in his squeaky little voice, "Show me the decree." [Laughter.]

So I say show me the deeds. I never saw one of those deeds, and I do not believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] knows five words in any one of them.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I have read them often enough to know.

Mr. HAMMOND. No doubt you have; but I would like to see "the decree." And suppose I saw it, it would be simply, at last, a statement that the United States should not be subject to any tax or charge by any State, county, city, or municipality, and the United States are not subject now to any such charge, and would not be even if the words were not in the deed. It is the mere asking by the citizens of a corporation, "Will you share in this expense?"

Now there seems to be a great deal of alarm here lest the cities should combine to get something out of the United States Treasury. Since I have been in this Congress, without any application from the city of Atlanta, I suppose on the mere motion of somebody on the Appropriations Committee, $15,000 was appropriated for the "approaches" to the public building in the city of Atlanta. Those approaches were just as good as the approaches to any other building at the time the appropriation was made, and the $15,000 was used in taking up good brick pavements and putting down stone. Where is the principle that allows the United States every day to appropriate money for approaches to buildings, and yet says that they ought to make a law that the approaches are confined to sidewalks?

There is not a statute-book for the last twenty-five years that has not in it some appropriation for the approaches to some public building. That means that when the Government erects a public building it will provide a way to get to it. You are here passing bills every Congress to make ways to get to your cemeteries, bills that make miles of road and frequently improve private property, yet such a road is simply an approach to your cemetery. That is all. Take the streets of any city, what are they? They do not belong to the city for city purposes. The city can not sell them; it can not mortgage them; it can use them only for streets; and the streets in Atlanta are just as free to a citizen of New York as they are to me, and the streets in New York are just as free to me as to a New Yorker.

The streets of a city are for public uses. The Government may help me to make a street over which I can ride pleasantly in a carriage, but if it does, it gets the advantage of having its carriages come up unbroken to its doors. It may make a street to help Atlanta in some regards, but if so it is helping all the people in the nearly fifty counties that come to the courts of Atlanta. It is all a mistake to suppose that the United States court building is put up in the city of Atlanta for the benefit of Atlanta.

Atlanta as a corporation would be better off without it. She would have more property to tax. She would have some other structure where that building stands, or the United States would have bought some other place and erected its building anyhow. Atlanta is $70,000 out, eternally, for the location of that building. I do not expect you to help us pay for the street. It may be that these gentlemen who have always defeated such things can draw a distinction between the street and the approaches, and will draw it in the future; but I would not sit silent and see such a petition, when I come here asking such an appropriation, forestalled by a piece of legislation that means nothing but buncombe.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. DIBBLE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in the remarks I have made on this bill and in the argument I have made in its favor I have discussed it solely from a Federal standpoint. I have not introduced the question of what was one city's interest or another city's interest. The cities should be all treated alike, and when you come to consider the question I should like to know how many towns there are in the country that have no Federal public buildings, yet are asked to contribute to repairing the streets in the towns that have such buildings.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Not repairing them.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the United States Government ought to treat communities as decently as citizens are compelled to treat each other. When a man owns property abutting on a street he owns the fee to the middle of the street, and it is made the duty of the property-owner to pay for the paving to the middle of the street. The Government of the United States owns the fee to the middle of the street, and the Government of the United States, it seems to me, ought to pay for the paving of that portion of the street of which it owns the fee, and which would revert to the Government if the street were abolished. I do not see why the Government should not do that, and I know very well that in my State, unless the Government is required to do so, it will lead to complications, because in some of the cities there is no provision made for paving the streets except by taxing the owners of the abutting property. That is the only method provided; and if the Government fails to pave the street in front of its property out to the middle, the result will be that that part of the street will go unpaved.

The first section of the bill I believe to be all right. The second section I believe to be entirely too parsimonious, altogether too economical to be fair in the transactions of this Government with the people. I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia will prevail and that that section will be stricken out.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, so far as the economy is concerned to which my colleague [Mr. HAMMOND] has referred which is to result to the Government from having a good roadway for the approach of its wagons to the public buildings, I wish to remind him that the Government does not own those wagons at all. The wagons in which the mails are carried are owned by the contractors, so that that argument does not apply. So far as Atlanta is concerned, my colleague thinks the city has been injured by the erection of that public building.

Mr. HAMMOND. Oh, no; I said in a pecuniary sense.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, I do not care. I will take it in any sense the gentleman wishes. It is quite clear and fresh in my mind that the city council of Atlanta voted $50,000——

Mr. HAMMOND. Seventy thousand dollars.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague corrects me and makes the amount larger. That city voted $70,000 for a site, and kept its mayor here for weeks trying to induce Congress to provide for the construction of a public building in Atlanta, and, through the efforts of the representatives of the city here, that object was attained. Therefore, although my colleague may be correct, the authorities of the city of Atlanta, who may be presumed to have represented the general sentiment of the people there at that time, took an entirely different view of the matter, and if I am not mistaken the people of that city now take great pride in the public building that has been erected there.

Now, sir, as I have said before, it is rarely the case the Government uses it. Those streets, if they are paved, are paved largely in the interest of the trade and business of the city, after a determination by the people who represent the tax-payers as to the interest of those tax-payers that it is in the interest of that property.

Mr. RANDALL. And the adjacent property, too.

Mr. BLOUNT. And the adjacent property, too.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] says it is too economical. Mr. Speaker, it is not the habit of Congress to be too economical. The cry from the country has always been the other way, that there was too much extravagance and log-rolling and waste of public treasure, and too few who would stand the odium of being called economists in the interests of the United States. There is no reason on the face of the earth, in equity or in any other way, why the Government should go into the cities where they need streets paved, and because they have given a public building there which they have been begged for, and be subjected, without their consent, without consultation, to the will of the citizens in the matter of taxation.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If this bill becomes a law, then any grant or deed from a municipality to the General Government will be accepted hereafter subject to that condition. It will come under the provisions of this bill, which will prohibit any contribution toward the payment of this tax or making the Government liable for any assessment for paving streets.

Mr. HAMMOND. How much stronger prohibition can you get than the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is a declaration in addition. If the Constitution already provides for this prohibition, then certainly the bill itself can not be charged with being unconstitutional.

Mr. HAMMOND. You may petition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It settles this question: That after we have constructed public buildings all over the country, then the Government of the United States is not to be taxed thereafter for the purpose of putting down sidewalks and paving the streets around those buildings; that hereafter we are not to be annoyed with bills, petitions, and requests for appropriations by the hundreds, as otherwise we would be. When we put up buildings now by the hundred and they may hereafter be by the thousand, this bill will have the effect of protecting us against such annoyances as petitions and bills asking for the paving of streets and sidewalks, I think it is a very proper measure and ought to pass.

Mr. DIBBLE demanded the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The question first recurred on the following amendment of the committee:

After the words "paid for," in line 6, insert the following:
"Nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. HAMMOND, to strike out section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That hereafter the United States shall not be responsible for or chargeable with any expense attending the paving or repaving of any streets surrounding or adjacent to any public building constructed by the United States outside of the District of Columbia.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 62.

Mr. HAMMOND. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. HAMMOND and Mr. DIBBLE.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I have a suggestion to make to the gentleman from South Carolina. He has some other bills to bring forward, and as I do not desire to prevent their passage I suggest, as there is no quorum present and it is hardly worth while to disturb gentlemen who have gone home, that this bill shall go over until we can have a full House to vote upon it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let us finish it this afternoon.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman knows best what he will do, but I think my suggestion is a fair one.

Mr. HAMMOND. There being such a large majority against me, I do not think I should postpone the vote to another day or insist further on my point of no quorum, and therefore will withdraw it.

The tellers reported ayes 28, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF GROUNDS, WASHINGTON NATIONAL MONUMENT.

Mr. DIBBLE. I now call up the bill (H. R. 5097) to regulate the use of the grounds of the Washington National Monument, known as public reservation No. 3, in the city of Washington, D. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That public travel in and occupancy of the grounds in and about the Washington National Monument, known as public reservation No. 3, shall be restricted to the roads, walks, and places prepared for the purpose, by paving, flagging, or otherwise.

SEC. 2. That it is forbidden to occupy the roads in such manner as to obstruct or hinder their public use; to drive violently upon them, or with animals not under perfect control; or to use them for the conveyance of goods or merchandise, except on Government service.

SEC. 3. That it is forbidden to offer or expose any article for sale; to display any sign, placard, or other form of advertisement; to solicit fares, alms, subscriptions, or contributions.

SEC. 4. That it is forbidden to step or climb upon, remove, or in any way deface, disfigure, or injure any statue, seat, wall, or other structure, or any tree, shrub, plant, or turf.

SEC. 5. That it is forbidden, unless upon permission granted by proper authority, to discharge any fire-arm, firework, or explosive; set fire to any combustible; make any harangue or oration; or utter loud, threatening, or abusive language.

SEC. 6. That it is forbidden, unless upon permission granted by proper authority, to parade, stand, or move in procession or assemblages, or display any flag, banner, or device designed or adapted to bring into public notice any party, organization, or movement.

SEC. 7. That it is forbidden to mark, scratch, stain, or in any way deface or disfigure any surface or part of the monument, or to chip off fragments or pieces from any of the stone, iron, or other parts of the completed structure, or its surrounding and accompanying buildings.

SEC. 8. That offenses against this act shall be triable before the police court of the District of Columbia, and shall be punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the judge of said court, the fine to be not less than $5, the imprisonment not less than fifteen days; but in the case of heinous offenses, by reason of which public property shall have suffered damage to an amount exceeding $100 in value, said judge of the police court may commit or hold to bail the offender for trial before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, where the offense shall be punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a period of not less than six months nor more than five years.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of all persons employed in the service of the Government at the Washington National Monument, or upon its surrounding grounds, known as public reservation No. 3, to prevent, as far as may be in their power, offenses against this act, and to aid the said police and watchmen, by information or otherwise, in securing the arrest and conviction of offenders.

Mr. DIBBLE. The committee recommend an amendment to section 9.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "known as public reservation No. 3," in section 9, insert "including persons there employed under the United States Fish Commission."

Mr. DIBBLE. I will state that this bill has been carefully prepared and that the Washington National Monument Association asks its passage. The amendment is requested by Professor Baird, in charge of the Fish Commission, as some of the employés in the service of the Government in that commission have also to do with these grounds.

Mr. HAMMOND. I am not sure that I heard the reading of this bill correctly, and I ask the gentleman from South Carolina for information. I understand that it forbids the making of any harangue or oration or other threatening remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIBBLE. No, sir; the gentleman is entirely mistaken. The bill reads:

To make any harangue or oration, or utter loud, threatening, or abusive language.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me ask the gentleman whether this would not prohibit an oration on some public occasion when it was desirable to use the grounds for this purpose?

Mr. DIBBLE. It would not prevent that; it prohibits orations except by permission granted by the proper authorities.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed; there being on a division—ayes 66, noes 3.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will state that these are all the bills which I have been instructed by the committee to report.

The motion of Mr. HAMMOND was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

By Mr. FINDLAY: Of citizens of State of Maryland.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 19, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4007) to admit free of duty a certain set of altars for the Catholic church of Saint John the Evangelist, in the parish of La Fayette, Louisiana; was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 27, 1886, a report of the Adjutant-General as to the organization and maintenance of the bands of the United States Army; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication, with the accompanying report, will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and printed if there be no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I should be glad to have the report lie upon the table until I can examine it with a view of making some statement to the Senate concerning it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order to refer will not be made. The Senator from Kansas moves that the communication lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a preamble and resolutions of the United Labor League of America, tendering their thanks to Mr. Gladstone for his home-rule measure to Ireland, and asking the Senate to pass a vote of thanks to him for the measure; also asking that the preamble and resolutions be published in the RECORD for the information of the Senate. The preamble and resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution relative to the building of a memorial structure at Marietta, Ohio.

Whereas the acquisition of the territory northwest of the Ohio River, by conquest from the British Crown, was an object of great national importance to the United States; and

Whereas this acquisition was effected by the wisdom and patriotism of the Continental Congress in conducting the affairs of the Confederacy through the memorable Revolutionary struggle, and also to the valor, endurance, and sacrifice of the army; and

Whereas the Congress representing the old thirteen States, comprising the Confederacy, succeeded in quieting all claims to adverse titles to this territory, so that it became common property to be used and disposed of for our common benefit; and

Whereas by the laws and ordinances of that Congress the blessings of civil and religious liberty, with full guarantees of personal freedom, and personal rights, have been forever secured to posterity; and

Whereas the first settlement of the territory of the northwest was made at Marietta, Ohio, in April, 1788, where it is now proposed to hold a centennial celebration, April 7, 1888, in commemoration of that historic event, and regarding this as an appropriate occasion for the nation to express its gratitude for the services rendered, both by the Continental Congress and the army under its control: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their efforts to obtain an appropriation for the erection of a suitable monumental structure at said city of Marietta, Ohio, to commemorate this historic event.

Resolved, second, That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to our Senators, and to each member of the House of Representatives of Congress of the United States from Ohio.

JOHN C. ENTREKIN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ROBERT KENNEDY.
President of the Senate.

Adopted March 31, 1886.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of canners and exporters of Boston, Mass., a petition of the Atlantic Refining Company and other firms of Philadelphia, Pa., a petition of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., and a petition of the Board of Trade of Baltimore, Md., praying for the repayment in full by the United States of duties originally paid on imported material when manufactured and exported; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Iowa (the senate concurring), That our Representatives in Congress be requested and our Senators instructed to use all proper means within their power to procure the speedy passage of the bill known as the "Cullom bill, regulating interstate commerce," and to protest against the amendment thereto proposed by the freight bureau of Chicago, abrogating car-load rates, which are so essential to the business interests of the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of our Representatives at Washington by the secretary of state, duly attested.

STATE OF IOWA, Polk County, ss:

I hereby certify that above resolution has passed both branches of Twenty-first General Assembly.

FRANK S. RICE, Assistant Clerk.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original concurrent resolution of the Twenty-first General Assembly as the same appears on file in this office.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix the great seal of the State. Done at the capitol, in Des Moines, this 14th day of April, A. D. 1886, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth, and of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of 95 Knights of Labor of Cable, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PALMER presented a memorial of 95 Knights of Labor of Essexville, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Snoddy's Mill, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of South Bend, Ind., remonstrating against the employment of convict labor on public works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of Grange No. 434, of Pennsylvania, and a memorial of Grange No. 151, of Pennsylvania, Patrons of Husbandry, remonstrating against the admission of agricultural raw materials free of duty; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Pennsylvania Woman's Suffrage Association, praying for woman suffrage; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Bolivar, N. Y., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Beverly, Mass., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, Rockport, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Harper and Caldwell, in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Garden City, Finney County, Kansas, praying that a patent may be issued to George Beck for a tract of land in Finney County, Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FAIR presented a resolution of the Nevada Live-Stock Association, favoring such legislation as will prevent the introduction and spread of pleuro-pneumonia; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. INGALLS presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Burlingame, Concordia, and Caldwell, in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for the formation of the Territory of Oklahoma; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Kirwin, Kans., praying for the construction and ownership by the United States of an experimental double-track railroad from New York city to Kansas City, Mo.; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. VEST presented a memorial of the Stamford Manufacturing Company, S. V. & S. P. Scudder, and other firms, of Saint Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of House bill 2522, in regard to the export of tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Saint Joseph, Mo., remonstrating against certain amendments proposed by merchants of Chicago to Senate bill 1532, to regulate commerce, known as the Cullom bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. 675) for the relief of E. B. McPherson, jr.; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a memorial similar to the one presented by my colleague [Mr. VEST], signed by the Stamford Manufacturing Company, S. V. & F. P. Scudder, Weaver & Sterry, limited, Young & Smylie, and Mellor & Rittenhouse, of Saint Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of House bill 2522, in regard to the rebate on tobacco. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a memorial of the board of directors and transportation committee of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., remonstrating against the amendments proposed by the merchants of Chicago to the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce, known as the Cullom bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. 210) for the relief of Charles P. Chouteau; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Baltimore and Westernport, in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1985) to provide for inquests under national authority, to move its indefinite postponement and to report a new bill. The new bill is in substance the same as the old one. There is but one unimportant amendment.

The bill (S. 2171) to provide for inquests under national authority was read twice by its title.

Mr. COKE. I desire to state that a minority of the Judiciary Committee dissent from that report and wish that their dissent be entered upon the record.

Mr. HOAR. I move that Senate bill 1985 be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 867) to amend section 714 of the Revised Statutes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1999) to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. The same committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 1869) to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon, which is a duplicate of the bill just reported, instruct me to move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 66) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to; and he reported a bill (S. 2172) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent that I may hereafter submit a written report to accompany the original bill just reported, if I shall conclude to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will have a right to do that at any time.

Mr. MORGAN. I give notice that in that case I shall file a dissenting opinion.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1599) for the relief of the Phœnix National Bank of the city of New York, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PIKE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, commonly known as the 4th of July bill, have directed me to report it with one amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 666) to create two additional land districts in the Territory of Dakota, and to define the boundaries of the Deadwood land district, in said Territory, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 934) making an appropriation to enable the Secretary of the Interior to settle the accounts of Norman Thacher, late a receiver of public moneys at Menasha, Wis., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], from the Committee on the Judiciary, presented a report last week in relation to the bill (H. R. 6661) to provide for closing up the business and paying the expenses of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes. That report was inadvertently made by that honorable Senator. There had been an understanding with the chairman of the committee, which he had for the moment forgotten, that a minority report should accompany the majority report and that the latter should be withheld until the former was prepared. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for leave to present the views of the minority, which I will endeavor to do to-morrow, and that they may be printed with the majority report. That has not yet come from the Printer, and the two can be printed together without any reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection of course to the order being made; but the report on my part was not made through any inadvertence whatever. This is the first notice which I have had of such an understanding in regard to the views of the minority.

Mr. HOAR. The inadvertence was on the part of the chairman of the committee, who authorized me to make this statement, as he had for the moment forgotten an arrangement which he had made with me. It was not the inadvertence of the Senator from Iowa, but of the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made as requested, there being no objection.

HALL OF RECORDS.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 103) making appropriation for the purchase of ground and the erection thereon, in the city of Washington, of a building to be used as a hall of records, to report it favorably.

I hope I may be permitted to make a single remark in regard to the bill, as I propose to ask for its immediate consideration. It is a bill providing for a hall of records in the city of Washington. It has passed the Senate unanimously twice. Both President Arthur and President Cleveland have recommended the passage of the bill; and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], during my illness, offered a resolution asking why the committee had not reported the bill. It is now reported favorably, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $200,000 for the purchase of a site near the War Department and erection thereon of a brick and metal fire-proof building, to be used for the safe-keeping of records of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments not required in the present executive, legislative, or judicial offices for constant reference; the building to be erected under the supervision and direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, on plans and specifications approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Is the building to be used for the numerous private papers of the President, or merely for the public records? [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. It is for the public records of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

A bill (H. R. 6873) relating to the construction of public buildings;

A bill (H. R. 6980) making an appropriation to complete the public building at Jackson, Tenn., and to reappropriate an unexpended balance therefor;

A bill (H. R. 7467) to grant for the use of the public a street across the United States grounds in the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee;

A bill (H. R. 7643) for the relief of Capt. John Burkhart;

A bill (H. R. 7650) to remove the political disabilities of I. G. Flournoy, of Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. 7881) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas R. Ware, of Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. 7892) authorizing the use of the Louisville and Portland Canal basin upon certain conditions.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4232) to reimburse the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for losses incurred through the failure of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va., and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 5198) to remove the disabilities of John Taylor Wood, of Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. 5876) for the relief of Dinwiddie B. Phillips.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

A bill (H. R. 868) appropriating money for the completion of the public building at Frankfort, Ky.;

A bill (H. R. 2410) for the addition of a third story to the public building in Dallas, Tex.;

A bill (H. R. 4498) authorizing an additional appropriation of $25,000 for the court-house at Keokuk, Iowa, to make the same fire-proof;

A bill (H. R. 4503) to authorize the Secretary of War to permit the Carrollton and Lock No. 1 Turnpike Road Company to locate and construct its road on land belonging to the United States at lock No. 1, on the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky;

A bill (H. R. 5097) to regulate the use of the grounds of the Washington National Monument, known as public reservation No. 3, in the city of Washington, D. C.;

A bill (H. R. 6873) relating to the construction of public buildings;

A bill (H. R. 6980) making an appropriation to complete the public building at Jackson, Tenn., and to reappropriate an unexpended balance therefor; and

A bill (H. R. 7467) to grant for the use of the public a street across the United States grounds in the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 1185) for the relief of Emma H. Fish; and

A bill (H. R. 7643) for the relief of Capt. John Burkhart.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 914) for the relief of Mrs. Fannie S. Conway; and

A bill (H. R. 2397) for the relief of Thomas F. Purnell.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. 1982) for the relief of John Fraser;

A bill (H. R. 2357) for the relief of H. H. Faulkner and Mary Woodlee;

A bill (H. R. 2522) to authorize the establishment of export tobacco manufactories, and for drawback upon imported articles used in manufacturing exported tobacco; and

A bill (H. R. 4232) to reimburse the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for losses incurred through the failure of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va., and for other purposes.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 1280) to authorize Frank W. Hunt to erect and maintain a ferry across the Missouri River at the military reservation of Fort Buford, Dakota Territory; and

A bill (H. R. 7892) authorizing the use of the Louisville and Portland Canal basin upon certain conditions.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 7650) to remove the political disabilities of I. G. Flournoy, of Mississippi; and

A bill (H. R. 7881) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas R. Ware, of Virginia.

The bill (H. R. 5891) to authorize a patent for the south half of the southeast quarter of section 34, in township 22, of range 15, east of the sixth principal meridian, to Elizur B. Hall, as administrator of the estate of William Frederick Schlagel, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 15, 1886.

INDIAN AGENT.

Thomas Jennings, of Shawano, Wis., to be agent for the Indians of the Green Bay agency, in Wisconsin.

MINT ASSAYER.

Frank F. Claussen, of Louisiana, to be assayer of the mint of the United States at New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

John Whiteaker, of Oregon, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Oregon.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 1305) of John Whiteaker, of Oregon, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Oregon, in place of John C. Cartwright, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Mr, Whiteaker is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of John C. Cartwright, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 19, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 17, 1886, asking "whether or not there are any papers or charges on file reflecting against the official or moral character of John C. Cartwright, late collector of internal revenue for the district of Oregon, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down by the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions. But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such a change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

A resolution, as follows, was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Finance, April 6, 1886, in relation to this and all similar letters:

"Resolved, That the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance, dated March 16, 1886, or subsequently, in relation to the suspension of collectors of internal revenue, should be received and held as honest declarations made in good faith that there are no charges or papers on file in the Department reflecting in any manner against their moral or official conduct or character."

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Whiteaker.

POSTMASTERS.

M. Eugene Barlow, to be postmaster at Canastota, Madison County, New York.

Bruce Gibson, to be postmaster at Winchester, Frederick County, Virginia.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

In this case of Bruce Gibson, nominated to be postmaster at Winchester, Va., vice John H. Dean, suspended under the provisions of the 1768th section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it appears—

(1) That at the date of Dean's suspension the statutory term had yet to run thirteen months.

(2) That in response to request made of the Post-Office Department for all papers, embracing charges, recommendations, and petitions on which was based the same, only such papers as relate to the nominee, Gibson, were furnished.

(3) That as there can be no charges against the character of Dean or his efficient administration of the office other than such as may have been surreptitiously preferred and are held under covenant of the Vilas letter, and there is no objection to Gibson, the nomination of Gibson is reported to the Senate with the recommendation that it be confirmed.

John A. R. Varner, to be postmaster at Lexington, Rockbridge County, Virginia.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

In this case of John A. R. Varner, nominated to be postmaster at Lexington, Va., vice Charles E. Deaver, suspended under the provisions of the 1768th section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it appears—

(1) That at the date of Deaver's suspension the statutory term of his office had yet to run some nine months.

(2) That in response to request made of the Post-Office Department for all papers embracing charges, recommendations, and petitions on which was based the same, only such papers as are recommendatory of the nominee, Varner, charging at the same time the unfitness of Deaver, by reason of bad habits and non-attention in person to the duties of the office, are given.

(3) That the nomination of Varner is reported to the Senate with the recommendation that it be confirmed.

William W. Herbert, to be postmaster at Alexandria, Alexandria County, Virginia.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

In this case of William W. Herbert, nominated to be postmaster at Alexandria, Va., vice David A. Windsor, suspended under the provisions of the 1768th section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it appears—

(1) That at the time of the suspension of Windsor his statutory term of office had yet to run something over one year.

(2) That in view of the persistent refusal of the Post-Office Department to furnish such papers as may have been filed in other cases of suspension, and on which suspensions are pretended to have been made, no request for such papers on which this suspension is pretended to have been made was preferred.

(3) That while the annexed letter of Windsor, addressed to the President, and received by him, as evidenced by the registered receipt attached, discloses the fact that his suspension was to be made on charges as solicited by the Vilas circular letter, it is not believed that any charges were preferred against Windsor affecting either his character as a man or his administration of the office, other than such as may have been preferred surreptitiously, in response to the Vilas circular letter.

(4) That there is no objection to the appointee.

(5) That the nomination of Herbert be reported to the Senate with the recommendation that it be confirmed.

ALEXANDRIA, VA., February 19, 1886.

SIR: I most respectfully beg leave, through you, to submit the accompanying papers, with the facts therein contained, to the honorable members of the Postal Committee of the United States Senate, and ask at their hands an investigation into the causes and facts relating to my suspension and removal from the position of postmaster of the city of Alexandria, State of Virginia; also, into the standing and condition of said office at that time and prior thereto.

Among the papers hereto submitted is a copy of a letter dated May 23, 1885, from me to his excellency the President, which will give you all of the detailed facts as gathered by me; also the post-office registered receipt to insure safe transit and delivery, and the President's receipt for the said letter. Since that time the only communication received from the President was his order of suspension and removal, dated July 6, 1885, which I also submit.

I am to-day totally ignorant of the cause of my removal, and know of none save that I am a Republican, and ask at your hands a vindication of my character and the manner in which I filled the position intrusted to my care and confidence, and earnestly desire that the good character that I have always borne in a community where I have lived all my life—over fifty years—be relieved from the taint and insinuation that I am a rascal and have been turned out.

I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

DAVID A. WINDSOR.

Hon. WILLIAM MAHONE,
Member United States Senate Postal Committee.

ALEXANDRIA, VA., May 23, 1885.

SIR: In a conversation with Hon. John S. Barbour, of this State, on the 21st instant, I was informed by him that charges had been preferred against me as postmaster of my native city, Alexandria, Va. I asked him if I would be entitled to a copy of them for investigation. His reply was, "Certainly." I immediately called upon Postmaster-General Vilas, introducing myself, and informed him of the conversation and information obtained from Mr. Barbour, and requesting to be furnished with a copy of charges and the names of my accusers. The answer received from the Postmaster-General was, that he did not propose to make his Department a court of inquiry. I then asked him to be allowed to see the charges and the names of the accusers; this he positively declined to do. I then asked him if he intended to inaugurate a star-chamber tribunal under civil-service reform, to invite and receive charges against officials, to convict and execute without giving them an opportunity of knowing that they were even accused, and in all probability by partisans of disreputable character; to this his only reply was that it was only necessary for him to know that charges were made and that he would act accordingly. I then invited him to an examination and the standing of my office. That was, he said, left to the examiners.

This was all I could obtain in the way of satisfaction, information, or justice from the Postmaster-General. I then informed him that I was sorry that I should be compelled to call upon one higher in authority than himself. I have endeavored to correctly quote the conversation between the Postmaster-General and myself, and, knowingly, would not misrepresent him. I do, therefore, Mr. President, with the great respect to which your exalted position entitles you, make this my appeal, and lay before you the above statement of facts. I desire to say further that the administration of my office stands unassailed and unassailable. I received my office at the hands of a Republican administration, and while I would not out of self-respect violate the proprieties of my official relations with an administration of opposite politics, I did not suppose it was intended to remove term officers merely because they were Republicans, and if my removal is to be made simply for that reason, I have nothing more to say, as I have no concessions to make of my political faith, but if for any better cause, then I most respectfully suggest I certainly have a right to know it. I would make no compromise of my political convictions to retain my position, and the man who would, in my judgment, is unworthy the respect and confidence of any party.

Surely the highest attribute of a wise and honest ruler should be a guarantee of justice to the most humble citizen, and, Mr. President, I can not believe that one occupying the exalted position of yourself, and upon whom so much depends, will allow your subordinates to convert the Government Departments into star-chamber tribunals under the guise of "civil-service reform," for the purpose of inviting and receiving charges, trying, convicting, and depriving citizens of their rights upon ex parte evidence.

I ask, therefore, respectfully the opportunity of seeing and meeting my accusers and the right of defense. Certainly the humblest citizen is entitled to this privilege; otherwise, it can not but appear that I am removed wholly upon political grounds, by secret charges, without an opportunity of defense.

I am, most respectfully,

DAVID A. WINDSOR, Postmaster.

His excellency GROVER CLEVELAND,
President United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 19, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

MINORITY REPORTS, OHIO ELECTION CASE.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask consent to have the views of the minority of the Committee on Elections, reported by me in the Hurd vs. Romeis election case, printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The reports are as follows:

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the following as the views of the minority:

The undersigned dissent from the opinion of the majority of the Committee on Elections in this case, and submit the following as the views of the minority:

The returned plurality for the sitting member is 239. To overcome this the contestant assails the returns in three precincts and asks that the whole vote of each shall be rejected from the count. He also claims that there were cast in the city of Toledo a large number of illegal votes, of which he asks that the precinct where they were cast shall be purged.

There is no doubt of the power of the House to reject for sufficient reasons the entire poll of an election district. In every precinct the election is a separate and independent one. The machinery for carrying it on is complete in itself. The election of a precinct when conducted and returned according to law is a finished work, which is to be taken by the officer upon whom the law imposes that duty and put in its proper place in the general return. But the law looks to a general return made up of precinct returns that are in themselves true, and has provided that if one or more of these separate elements, of which the structure of a general return is constituted, is untrue, it shall be stricken from the count. This results inevitably from a universal principle governing alike official acts and private conduct that verity shall never be imparted to falseness. The power of rejecting an entire poll has been repeatedly exercised by the House of Representatives, by legislative bodies of the various States, and by the courts.

When the vote of a whole precinct is rejected, the result is the same as though no election at all had been held there, and the vote cast for each candidate will be deducted from his total vote, or, what is the same thing, the majority returned in such precinct will be taken from the aggregate majority of him for whom it was given.

The principles upon which an entire poll will be rejected are well settled. "To validate an election," says Mr. Lamar in the case of Spencer vs. Morey, Election, Digest of 1870-'79, page 447, "there must be votes legally deposited by legal voters, and legally counted, and the result legally declared."

When these things are done the result will remain, although there may be misconduct on the part of the officers by failing to comply with the provisions of directory statutes. The will of the people will not be disappointed because of irregularities which do not prevent the true result from being ascertained.

The rule is stated correctly in Covode vs. Foster, page 600:

"It has long been held by all judicial tribunals of the country, as well as by the decisions of Congress and the Legislatures of the several States, that an entire poll should always be rejected for any one of the three following reasons:

"(1) Want of authority in the election board.

"(2) Fraud in conducting the election.

"(3) Such irregularities or misconduct as render the election void."

In Wheelock's case, 82 Pennsylvania State, page 299, it was held:

"Where, however, it is alleged that there was actual fraud in the election, or that the ballot-box was tampered with or illegal votes received, or the careless or fraudulent acts of the officers have mixed and confused the ballots, the duty of the court is equally plain, and every legal facility should be afforded to purge the poll, and when the acts of the officers are so fraudulent and irregular that the result can not be ascertained, then the entire poll is rejected."

In Finley vs. Bisbee, Digest of 1876-'80, page 76, it is said:

"It being conceded, as we have already said, that the returns must be thrown out on the ground that they are false and forged, and your committee agreeing with that view, we are compelled to look to the other evidence in the case, in order to ascertain if possible what the true vote was. If the true vote can be ascertained with reasonable certainty, it must be counted. If it can not be so ascertained and determined, then the entire vote of the precinct should be thrown out, and nothing counted for either contestant or contestee."

These doctrines have been affirmed in many cases, so that it can be safely said there is no controversy about them. They may be succinctly stated as follows:

The return of the officers is prima facie evidence of the result of the election in the precinct where it was held. Unassailed it is sufficient to be counted in the ascertainment of the general result. It may be impeached by anything which will show it to be untrue in fact or unworthy of credit because of the improper conduct of the officers of the election. The return is accepted as the act of sworn officers, to whose acts confidence is to be given upon the presumption that they have regarded the law and done their duty. But if they are shown to have disregarded the law and violated the statutes which have been adopted to preserve the purity of the election, then their return shall be rejected, because it is no longer entitled to the credit which is given to acts of officers who have done their duty.

The misconduct of the officers must be such as to make the result uncertain, for if, notwithstanding their irregularity, the true vote can be ascertained it shall be counted. But where the condition of the poll is such that the result can not be reached with reasonable certainty then the entire poll must be rejected.

Upon the impeachment of the return the party relying upon it may show the true vote by other evidence. This may be done by a recount of the ballots, or by the testimony of the voters, or of any one who was present at the election and is able to establish the true result. When this can not be shown, no vote from the precinct for any of the candidates can be counted.

The cases therefore show that a return may be rejected and the entire poll thrown out—

1. Where the return is proven to be false, and no satisfactory evidence is given of the result aliunde.

2. Where the irregularities of the officers of the election have been such as to involve the result in uncertainty.

3. Where the ballots have been taken from the place where they are required by law to be kept and exposed to being tampered with, especially if the testimony shows that they have actually been tampered with.

4. Where general bribery has been practiced in the precinct, rendering it impossible to separate the bribed votes from the honest ones. The rule on this point is clearly stated in the report in case of Goode vs. Platt, Digest of 1876, page 79: "These bribed votes should not be counted. * * * Their acceptance can only be avoided by applying the rule of law, so well known and of such general adoption that it need scarcely be repeated here, that when illegal or fraudulent votes have been proven, and the poll can not be purged with reasonable certainty, the whole vote must be rejected.

It is forcibly laid down in the minority report in Donnelly vs. Washburn, presented by ex-Speaker Keifer:

"The rule undoubtedly is in this country that where bribery, fraud, or intimidation is so interwoven with the vote of any voting precinct that it can not be eliminated from the aggregate vote with certainty, the whole vote of the precinct may and perhaps should be rejected. The unassailed vote on other voting places would, however, still stand. Fraud and bribery do not vitiate what they do not impregnate."

Applying these principles to the facts in this case we think there can be no difficulty in reaching a conclusion in favor of the contestant.

PRECINCT B, WARD 8, TOLEDO.

He assails first Precinct B, ward 8, of the city of Toledo, and asks that the whole poll be rejected. The vote returned was 325 for contestee and 105 for contestant, giving to the former a majority of 220. At the last general election preceding the precinct gave a Democratic majority of about 70.

We are of opinion that this precinct should be rejected on all the grounds which we have shown have been deemed sufficient to warrant the throwing out of entire polls in other cases.

(1) The return is false. As to this there is no dispute. In the argument of counsel for contestee it was conceded. Louis Jahn, page 73 of record, one of the judges of the election, says:

"Q. You say that the certificate is false, do you not?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You knew that the certificate was false to the poll-book when you signed it, did you not?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then you signed it knowing it was false, didn't you?

"A. Yes, sir."

This testimony is corroborated by one of the other judges and one of the clerks.

The falseness consisted in this, that there were five tickets short at the end of the count, and the judges ordered 2 votes to be added to every candidate, with no tickets in the box to correspond to the votes so added.

This of itself is enough to bring discredit upon this return, as no confidence is to be reposed in the acts of officers who are willing to certify under oath, in a solemn matter of that kind, that to be true which they know to be false. But with this standing alone, while we might hesitate to exclude this whole poll, we have no doubt on the subject when we consider the conduct of these officers in other particulars.

(2) Their irregularities were such as to leave the result in an uncertainty in which it is impossible to ascertain the true result. The following are the statutes of Ohio relating to the counting of the vote:

Page 2956:

"At the close of the polls the poll-books shall be signed by the judges and attested by clerks, and the names therein contained shall be counted and the numbers set down at the foot of the poll-books in the manner hereinafter provided in the form of the poll-books."

Page 2957:

"After the poll-books are signed, in the manner hereinafter provided for, the ballot-boxes shall be opened, and the ballots therein contained shall be taken out, one at a time, by one of the judges, who shall read aloud distinctly, while the ticket remains in the hand, the name or names thereon contained, and then deliver it to the second judge, who shall examine the same and pass it to the third judge, who shall string it on a thread and carefully preserve it, and the same method shall be observed in respect to each of the tickets taken out of the ballot-box until the number taken out of the ballot-box is equal to the number of names in the poll-books; and any ballots in the box in excess of the number of names on the poll-books, together with the ballots strung as aforesaid, shall be deposited in the box and locked, and the box and contents delivered to the officer authorized to receive and keep the key or keys, and the box shall remain locked until the expiration of the time within which any legal notice of contest can be given, and if such notice be given shall remain locked until the trial of such contest."

The testimony shows that the poll-books were not signed until after votes had been counted. (Page 73 of the record.) This made it impossible to do the counting as the statute prescribed. It was the intention of the law that the number of the vote should be ascertained before the counting began, in order that the judges might know the number of tickets to be taken out of the box. But in this case the number of votes was not attempted to be ascertained until the count had been finished.

The ballots were required to remain in the ballot-box until the poll-books had been signed and the total vote ascertained. Instead of that, immediately after the polls were closed the ballots were emptied onto the table in the room where the election had been held, and where there were twenty-five to thirty people present. That the ballots for several hours were away from the place in which, under the law, they ought to have been, out of the legal custody of the election officers, and exposed to the possibility of being tampered with, is clear. (See pages 28-9 and 68-9 of the record.)

The statute required that the judges should take the tickets from the box one by one and read the name on each. Instead of this, the tickets were arranged into four piles upon the table, from which the judges counted them by fives. The board also was illegally organized. Two of the judges were Republicans, while the third Democratic judge was a non-resident of the precinct. We think that a fair construction of the Ohio statute requires the judge to be a resident of the district in which the election is held. Both clerks were Republicans, while the law expressly provides that they should belong to different political parties.

From this it will appear that every important provision of the statute of Ohio as to conducting the election and counting the vote was violated.

It would have been singular if this misconduct had not brought confusion and uncertainty.

The testimony of the two judges upon this point is very clear.

James Kelley, one of the judges, says (page 29):

"Q. State whether or not the return, as made up by the officers of the election, stated truly the result of the election in that precinct.

"A. Well, that I could not say; the way it was mixed up, we could not say which way it was.

"Q. State, from what you know, whether or not there was any certainty in the vote as ascertained and counted that day.

"A. No; I couldn't give no certainty to it."

Louis Jahn, one of the judges, says (page 28):

"Q. State whether the returns, as signed by the judges, contain a true statement of the votes cast at that election.

"A. To tell the truth, I do not think none of us could tell what was the true vote cast.

"Q. State whether the return, as made, states the result at that precinct.

"A. It is not the true poll."

The counsel for contestee admitted that the return was not true, but claimed it could be amended by striking off the 2 votes which were added to each candidate.

If the addition of these votes had caused the uncertainty there might be force in the suggestion, but the uncertainty preceded the adding of the votes, the addition being to remove the uncertainty.

It is conceded that this act of the judges should not be regarded, and this House finds itself in the same position as the judges of the election on the night of the controversy.

The question therefore arises, Has the House evidence sufficient to enable it to determine the true result in that precinct?

It is clear that the return of the judges can not be regarded as evidence. It fails as an official act to have any power whatever. It is impeached, and its prima facie force is destroyed.

Other evidence must be produced to show the true vote, nor should the statement of the officers themselves be accepted. When the official act of one holding public place is rejected because he has violated the law and neglected his duty, what he himself says to sustain this act is entitled to little credit. The same evidence which impeaches his official acts will also impeach his unofficial declarations.

The contestee has failed to put a single witness on the stand to show the vote of this precinct. He has not asked a recount of the ballots. He has not proven a single vote for himself by the production of a voter.

It is claimed, however, that the statements of the judges and clerk show the true state of the vote independently of the return. This is not true, as a reference to the testimony will show.

James Kelley (page 30):

"13. Q. Do you remember the number of names that appeared on the poll-sheet at the close of the election as having voted?

"A. Four hundred and thirty."

Page 36:

"35. Q. Can you state now how many tickets you put on the string?

"A. No; I did not count them.

"36. Q. How did the number of tickets on the string, then, compare with the number that the poll-book showed had voted?

"A. I don't know; I didn't count the votes on the string."

Page 31.

"49. Q. Do you remember how many votes it was finally declared by you judges that Mr. Hurd had received in that precinct for Representative in Congress?

"A. I don't remember now what it was."

Louis Jahn (page 73):

"127. Q. The poll-book had a certificate to it in words as follows: 'It is hereby certified that the number of electors who voted at this election is 430,' did it not?

"A. I could not tell how many votes was polled; it was over 400.

"128. Q. The certificate did contain the correct number, did it not?

"A. No, sir; I think not.

Page 74:

"214. Q. Well, after you had given to Mr. Hurd 2 votes, without examining the tickets to see whether he was entitled to them, he had all told 105, didn't he?

"A. I don't know whether he did or not.

"215. Q. Look on the tally-sheet and see——

"A. Well, I couldn't tell that this is correct number, that this is the votes which has got on the tally-sheets, cause everything was mixed up."

Page 76:

"220. Q. Now, then, before you made that motion, Mr. Hurd had but 103, didn't he?

"A. Don't know how many he had. I couldn't tell that that was the right figure before."

Page 77:

"229. Q. Well, before you made your motion the tally-sheet showed Mr. Romeis and Mr. Hurd together to have 426 votes, didn't it?

"A. It did; but was not the right number of votes—that's where the clerks made the mistakes."

Page 77.

"234. Q. Well, answer me this now: when the tally-sheet, before your motion was made, showed the aggregate vote of Romeis and Hurd to be only 426, and there were 431 names on the poll-book, and you claimed there were extra uncounted tickets, why did you not proceed on counting enough tickets to equal the number of names on the poll-book?

"A. It did not show the number of votes. That is where the clerks made the mistakes."

Page 80.

"279. Q. At the time that those 2 votes were added to each candidate could any one tell the exact vote which any candidate had?

"(Objected to by contestee as calling for an opinion from the witness and being immaterial.)

"A. No, sir; none of us, judge or clerks, could tell the true number of votes."

Mr. Hahn (page 232):

"1162. Q. Who counted the ballots?

"A. The judges.

"1163. Q. You do not know, then, of your own knowledge, how many ballots there were?

"A. Nothing more than what I stated before. I have to take the judges' word for that."

There is nothing in this testimony which relieves the precinct from the uncertainty into which the illegal acts of these officers plunged it.

Kelley does not undertake to say of his own knowledge how many votes were cast. He says he did not count them. He only says that the impeached poll-book showed 430 votes. This proves nothing, as the poll-book speaks for itself, and that this is shown by it is not denied. He also states that he does not remember the vote declared for contestee.

Jahn, another judge, says that the return did not state truly the total vote; that it was not 430, but something over 400. He also states that 103 was not the true vote of contestant, and that 426 was not the true number of votes before the two votes were added to each candidate. But what is decisive upon this point is his answer when he is asked whether he could tell the exact vote of the candidate at the time of the addition of the two votes. He says:

"No, sir; none of us, judges or clerks, could tell the true number of votes."

Hahn, the clerk, states that he did not count the ballots, and knew nothing of the result, except that the judges told him.

In our judgment this testimony fails utterly to relieve this precinct from uncertainty. If the judges, that election night, had signed a certificate stating that, through their own acts of misconduct, they were unable to ascertain and declare the true result, they would have told the truth.

This House has no more evidence to act upon than it had; nor, indeed, as much. We can not undertake to do that which they could not truthfully have done, and we therefore are of opinion that this precinct should be thrown out on the ground of irregularities of the election officers which have rendered the result uncertain.

3. We recommend the rejection of this precinct for another reason.

After the ballots had been unlawfully thrown upon the table, an informal count of them was had. This showed seven tickets more than there were names on the poll-books. Another informal count followed, which showed the same result, one witness says, and three tickets more, as testified to by another.

When the final count was made they were five tickets short. Thus there disappeared, according to the statement of the judges themselves, between the beginning of the count and the end of it, at least twelve tickets. Not only were the ballots placed in a situation where they were liable to be tampered with, but they were actually tampered with to the extent of at least 12 votes. This would have been impossible if they had been retained in the ballot-box, where they were required by law to be kept.

Counsel for contestee insists that substantial justice will be done by taking from his majority these 12 votes. We do not so understand the law. Because the testimony does not show a tampering with more than 12 ballots, it is not to be presumed that all the other votes were honestly counted. We think that the presumption is, unless proof is given to the contrary, that the whole vote has been corrupted. He who would destroy ballots would not hesitate to make substitutions. After proof of tampering there can be no confidence in the ballots remaining, and the whole poll must be rejected, without the most satisfactory evidence that the tickets counted were the tickets actually deposited by the voters.

The rule established in such cases is well approved. In Bisbee, jr., vs. Findley (Digest of 1880-'82, page 180) it is said:

"These ballots can not be entitled to much weight as evidence of the result of the election where it has been shown that the acts and conduct of the election officers are unworthy of credit and their returns set aside. Having created for themselves, in violation of law and their official oaths, opportunities for tampering with the box, it is legitimate to infer that they would endeavor to put ballots in the box that would support the return."

In Spencer vs. Morey (Digest of 1877, page 447) the following text from McCrary is approved:

"If, for example, an election officer, having charge of a ballot-box, prior to or during its canvass, is caught in the act of abstracting certain ballots and substituting others, although the number shown to have been abstracted be not sufficient to change the result, yet no confidence can be placed in the contents of a ballot-box which has been in his custody."

In Cox vs. Stewart (Digest of 1871-'76, page 428) it is said:

"Your committee regard the conduct of the judges of election at this place, in leaving the ballot-box for the space of an hour unsealed and unguarded, as highly reprehensible. It is of the highest importance that the ballot-box should be guarded and protected in the most careful manner; that all the promises of the law made for the security of the ballot should be strictly obeyed; there should not be the least opportunity for tampering with the ballots.

"It is certainly a serious question whether such an irregularity as this ought not to vitiate the election, but your committee, under all the circumstances, have not felt compelled to reject the entire poll, there being no evidence that the ballot-box was actually tampered with, but, on the contrary, there is some negative testimony that it was not tampered with. Your committee, were there any facts tending to show that the ballot-box has been tampered with, would have decided to reject the return from this poll."

As we are satisfied from the testimony in this case that these ballots were actually tampered with, we are of opinion that for this reason also the whole vote of this precinct should be thrown out.

(4) Upon still another ground the poll of this precinct should be rejected.

The testimony satisfies us that there was a conspiracy to corrupt the precinct by money in the interest of contestee, and that it was successfully carried out. The evidence of Gerstmann, (pages 115 and 128 of the record), shows the plan to defeat the contestant and the methods by which it was executed.

He testifies that he was agent of the Republican national committee sent to Toledo for the purpose of finding the sentiment of people in certain districts before the October election of 1884. He, being able to speak the Polish and German languages, was assigned to this precinct, which was almost entirely inhabited by Germans and Poles. He was deputed to work in this precint by Captain Brown, who was the chairman of the Republican committee in the city of Toledo, and also the attorney of contestee in the contest.

He visited the precinct in pursuance of his instructions and went through it to find the sentiment of the people. He found them all for Hurd.

After some consultation he learned from them that the sentiment might be changed by the use of money. They informed him that from two to ten thousand dollars would be required to change the precinct.

After having obtained this information he reported to the local committee and then went to New York to report to the national committee. There he had an interview with S. B. Elkins, in which he reported the condition and the necessity of money for this precinct.

Mr. Elkins said that the election of Mr. Hurd was a nationally important question; that he was a free-trader, and that it was necessary he should be defeated. He said also that the money needed would be sent through the regular channels. He was directed to go to Toledo and tell them to do all they could to defeat Hurd.

In the work of his agency, Gerstmann returned to Toledo a few days before the election.

He visited the same persons and places he had visited before. He found the sentiment all changed. It was then against Hurd and for the contestee.

He learned from the voters there that the change had occurred through the use of money; that their wants had been satisfied; and he left Toledo before the election, as there was nothing more for him to do.

We call attention to the testimony of Gerstmann on page 128:

"4. Q. What was said, at your last visit to Toledo before the election, by Warnke and other voters in Precinct B, in ward 8, as to money or other considerations having been satisfactorily furnished to the voters of that precinct to carry it for Romeis?

"A. From the general conversations with Warnke and others living in that neighborhood there was no doubt in my mind that money and other materials were furnished to defeat Mr. Hurd in that precinct. There was no further use for me, and I left Toledo. My reasons for leaving, no doubt, is from the conversations which I had on that subject with Warnke and other voters of that precinct. I was satisfied in my own mind that Romeis would carry that precinct, notwithstanding at my first visit everything was for Hurd there. Had it not been for the use of money and other considerations used in the political machinery Hurd would certainly have carried the precinct.

"S. GERSTMANN."

To corroborate Gertsmann the testimony of Louis Jahn is offered, who swears that shortly after the election Henry Gates, the vice-president of the Republican organization in that precinct, boasted that he had paid on the night of election at a saloon in that precinct nineteen persons from $3 to $10 apiece for services as ticket peddlers.

Jahn also heard others say that the money had been so paid.

We think that if the statements of these witnesses are to be accepted as true, there can be no doubt that this precinct should be rejected.

If there were a conspiracy to send from $2,000 to $3,000 to a little precinct of less than 450 votes; if the voters were changed in sentiment, by their own confession, within two or three weeks by the use of this money; if the officers of the Republican organization, from the national down to the local committee, interested themselves to carry out this conspiracy, and if the corruption were so open and public that the local Republican manager in that precinct boasted shortly after the election that he had paid unusually large sums for a day's work to many more men than the legitimate expense of an election could possibly have required, it would be an outrage upon justice and fair dealing to permit the returns from this precinct to be counted.

The only answer made to this evidence by the contestee is that (1) the witness Gerstmann is not credible, and (2) that the testimony is not competent, as it is hearsay.

As to the first part, we reply that Gerstmann declared himself to be the agent of the Republican committee to do the work to which he was assigned, and stated that he was deputed to the special work in this precinct by Mr. Brown, the chairman of the Republican committee, the very man who was cross-examining him. He mentioned the name of Mr. Elkins and Mr. Schenck, two Republican managers, who had engaged him and to whom he reported. How easy it would have been for one of them to have gone onto the stand and testify that he was not their agent. They knew his testimony and realized its importance, and yet not one man undertook to contradict him.

Neither was there any effort to impeach him.

His testimony remains uncontradicted and unimpeached. There is nothing to affect his credibility, unless it shall be found in his cross-examination, and after the more thorough examination of that we are satisfied that there is nothing in it to weaken the force of the statement he makes as to the great points of his testimony.

The only question remaining is, Is the evidence competent?

It is said it is not, because it is hearsay. We are not of this opinion. The rule as to evidence in contested-election cases is stated in Cushing's Parliamentary Law, section 210:

"The same general rules by which courts of law are governed in regard to evidence in proceedings before them prevail also in the investigation of cases of contested elections; but inasmuch as a legislative assembly touching things appertaining to its cognizance is 'as well a council of state and court of equity and discretion as a court of law and justice,' the legal rules of evidence are generally applied by election committees more by analogy and according to their spirit than with the technical strictness of the ordinary judicial tribunals."

The testimony in this case is not offered to prove the bribery of individual voters, but to show the prevalence of corrupt methods in an election precinct. It is sought to throw out an election district because of general bribery. If individual acts were to be proved, the poll could be easily purged by the elimination of the bribed votes, which would disappoint the object in view. It is as though one were attempting to show the general reputation to be bad. You can not do this by proof of individual acts of bad conduct. It must be done by proof of what people generally say. When you would impeach a precinct for general bribery you must prove by analogy to the rule of courts of justice the fact in the same way. The general sentiment of a community, the changing it, and the common reports of the method by which it is done are all facts to be established as any other fact of common reputation.

In Buckwood Croft's Election Manual, page 43, Mr. Justice Willes says:

"General bribery, the prevalence of corrupt practices, whether by the member, whether by his agent, or whether by any undiscoverable person, bribery so general that the court should be satisfied that there was no free election, that there was only an apparent choice and not a real one, will vitiate the election."

The exact question as to the competency of this kind of testimony arose in the North Durham case, decided in 1874 by Mr. Baron Bramwell, reported in 2 O'Malley and Hardcastle, page 152.

In the course of the case a witness, who had been employed to canvass against respondents, was asked by the attorney for the petitioners:

"Q. When you canvassed the tradesmen what was the feeling you found among them?

"A. I found a reluctance to promise, and certain of them told me if they voted——

"Mr. Serjeant Parry objected to this as not being admissible. He submitted that the tradesmen must be asked if it was sought to be proved that they had been unduly influenced."

Mr. Baron Bramwell said:

"I think that you are at liberty to ask the question as to generals, but may not ask as to particulars. You may ask the general question whether he found any particular difficulty in getting promises in a particular district, and, if so, whether he can attribute it to any cause."

In the Westminster case, 1 O'Malley and Hardcastle, page 95:

"A witness called by the respondents stated that he was employed on behalf of a canvassing association to take down, day by day, the returns by the canvassers employed by the association of the promises they obtained, and to enter them in a book. He was then asked what was the total number of promises.

"Mr. Stephens, for the petitioners, objected to the question, on the ground that it involved hearsay on hearsay."

Mr. Baron Martin admitted the question on the ground that the information which the agent had thus received might have influenced his conduct in the management of the election.

In these recent English cases the very testimony which is objected to here has been admitted to show the general state of the sentiment of the district, and that it might have exerted influence upon the canvass. We think, for the same reasons, that the evidence of Gerstmann, the confessed agent, as to what he learned in this precinct is admissible.

The testimony of Jahn as to the declaration of Gates, the Republican manager, to the effect that he had paid nineteen men from $3 to $10 apiece on the night of the election, is said to be incompetent. The ground is that the declaration of an agent after his agency is over, narrative of what he did, is not competent. We admit this to be the rule, when it is being sought to charge the principal with the agent's declaration or acts.

In this case the proof is not offered to show that the sitting member was guilty of bribery, nor even that nineteen persons were bribed at that precinct, but as tending to show the condition of sentiment on election day at that precinct.

Will any one say that the declaration of a proved agent that he had bribed a number of men on election day, made a few days afterward, is not a circumstance tending to show the condition of feeling there that day?

Contestant denies that there was general corruption prevalent in that precinct on that day. He offers the boast of the election manager, made shortly after the election, that he had corrupted nineteen men on that day. We are clearly of the opinion that the testimony is admissible as tending to show the fact of general corruption at the election.

In the Southampton case (1 O'Malley and Hardcastle, page 221), the declaration of an agent to a man who had been discharged for voting against the will of his employers, made after the election, was admitted.

The question was—

"Q. When you went back to your work after the election did you see your employers' foreman?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did he say to you?

"(Mr. Gifford, for the respondents, objected.)"

Mr. Justice Willes said:

"My impression is that what is done after the election can only be material as throwing light upon some transaction before the election, and so leading to the supposition that there was before the election some violation of the corrupt-practices act. * * * I think the evidence is clearly admissible."

In two cases cited in Woolfenstan on Elections, 83, declarations of admitted agents were held competent, made several weeks after the election.

Many other cases could be cited to maintain the same doctrine, but we do not deem it necessary to refer to them.

We do not think that the objection that this is hearsay evidence is well taken for the reason already suggested. This testimony is admissible on another ground, that it is a statement of a co-conspirator as to the methods of the conspiracy, before the conspiracy was over, and while the work was incomplete in which he was engaged, of preventing the election to the House of the contestant.

Believing the evidence of these witnesses to be true, and that it is entirely competent, and finding that their statements, so detrimental to the contestee, are uncontradicted and unexplained by him, we reject the poll of this precinct because of the general bribery which prevailed there.

KELLEY'S ISLAND.

The next precinct assailed by contestant is Kelley's Island. Here the vote was 126 for contestee and 97 for contestant, making the majority for the former 29. At the last general election preceding this precinct had given a Democratic majority.

The ground of objection to this precinct is the intimidation practiced by one Norman Kelley, who employed seventy men, nearly one-third of the voters on that island. The intimidation consisted in threats of loss of employment to his men in case they voted for contestant, together with personal inspection of the tickets of the men on the election day by him.

Section 7065 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio declares it to be a felony for an employer to threaten to withhold or reduce wages of or to dismiss from service any laborer in his employ with a view of influencing his vote.

The effect of intimidation upon the result of an election is stated in the report made by ex-Speaker Keifer in the case of Donnelly vs. Washburn, already quoted.

"The rule undoubtedly is in this country that when bribery, fraud, or intimidation is so interwoven with the vote of any voting precinct that it can not be eliminated from the aggregate vote cast with certainty, the whole vote of the precinct may and perhaps should be rejected."

To show the nature and extent of the intimidation practiced in this precinct, we call attention to the testimony of Norman Kelley and the other witnesses.

Mr. Norman Kelley (page 308):

"Q. Did you have any conversations with any of your men upon the subject of the contestant's (Mr. Hurd's) candidacy for Congress?

"A. I did.

"Q. Did you have any conversation with your employés as to the subject of free trade and the effect which its adoption in this country would have upon their employment?

"A. I did, so far as my opinion on that question is concerned.

"Q. Did you say to your employés, or any of them, that the effect of the adoption of free trade would be, in your opinion, to embarrass the business in which you were engaged and they were employed?

"A. I think I did.

"Q. Did you say to your employés, or any of them, that in the event of embarrassment coming to your business by the adoption of free trade and the consequent necessary reduction of the force you employed, the persons to be first discharged would be those voting for the advocates of free trade?

"A. No, sir; I have never told any one in my employ so unconditionally.

"Q. Did you conditionally, and if so, with what conditions?"

"A. I said to two or three of my employés that in case Mr. Hurd was elected to Congress and Mr. Cleveland was elected President, and if free trade was adopted in this country, the effect would be to materially injure our business, and in that event, in my opinion, we would undoubtedly [not] require over or to exceed one-half and probably not over one-third of our present force of men, and that we thought the interest of our men was the same as our own.

"Q. What, if anything, did you say to these employés with whom you talked as to the discharge of employés in the event of a reduction being made necessary by the election of Hurd and Cleveland and the adoption of free trade?

"A. I have not a distinct recollection of what I said.

"Q. Can you give it generally and in substance?

"A. I said in the event of the adoption of free trade that, our employés knowing that their interest was identical with our own, we would naturally expect to retain those who voted for our interest and their own."

Fred W. Alvord (page 95):

"Q. State your name in full, and your place of residence.

"A. Fred W. Alvord. Reside in Sandusky, Ohio.

"Q. State your business.

"A. Fish dealer.

"Q. How long have you resided in Sandusky?

"A. Thirty-five years.

"Q. Do you know Norman Kelley, of Kelley's Island?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What is Mr. Kelley's business?

"A. Dealer in stone; has a stone-quarry, which he owns and operates.

"Q. You may state whether you had a conversation with Mr. Norman Kelley, about the time of the October election of 1884, in which he stated to you his conduct at that election; and, if so, you may state when and what that conversation was.

"(Objected by contestee's counsel.)

"A. This conversation occurred not about the time of the October election, but about three weeks ago, in Mr. Graham's drug-store. The conversation turned upon Mr. Hurd's contest, and he wanted to know of me what I thought Mr. Hurd expected to make of it. I told him I thought he would make a success of it. He expressed some surprise he should come on to Kelley's Island for testimony, and said that he did not believe he would be successful in finding any there. I told him that I believed that Mr. Hurd was going to set up intimidation. He answered very emphatically that there had not been anything of the kind there during either of the elections. He said he heard it stated he had himself tried to intimidate his men, but he said it was false. He then voluntarily related to me what he did say. He said he had never been in the habit of going around the polls at election, but, I think he said, John Woodford sent word to him that things were not going very well at the polls, and he must come up. He said he went up to the polls and said to his men that came up to vote and that were there that he considered Mr. Hurd's views on the tariff very detrimental to his interests, and that if Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Hurd were elected, and Mr. Hurd's views should prevail under a Democratic administration, he should not probably want over one-third as many men in his business as he was then employing; and that if he was compelled to discharge any of his men he should discharge those who were not voting or working for his interests. He then said he did not consider it intimidation, but that it was a matter of business with him; that he had to protect his own interests."

Nicholas Smith (page 97):

"Nicholas Smith, being sworn, testified as follows:

"Q. State your name and place of residence.

"A. Nicholas Smith; Kelley's Island, Ohio.

"Q. How long have you resided on Kelley's Island?

"A. I came here in 1860. Was employed here two years before I became a resident.

"Q. State your business.

"A. Mason, stone-cutter, and cementer.

"Q. You may state whether you were present at the polls at the election held on the 14th day of October, 1884.

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You may state what duty, if any, you had at that election.

"A. Was there as a challenger and worker for the party.

"Q. You may state whether you are acquainted with Mr. Norman Kelley.

"A. I am, sir.

"Q. You may state whether Mr. Kelley was at the polls on the 14th day of October last.

"A. He was.

"Q. You may state what Mr. Kelley did at the polls.

"A. Kelley was standing outside, on the steps of the hall. I stood alongside of him. Some of his men came up; one in particular—Pete Diffley. He either handed out a ticket or Kelley gave one to him; the ticket was in sight. Kelley said, 'Put it in! put it in!' Diffley advanced toward the voting-box. Kelley followed him and I followed Kelley in rotation through the crowd. Kelley came out toward the steps again. I said to him, 'Why don't you let your men have their own free will? None of your bulldozing here;' and he says, 'None of your damn business,' and he called me a liar. I said, 'It is my business.' I think I used the term, 'This is played out.' He hauled off and made an attempt to strike me. There was more words used besides that, which I don't recollect. After that he left. This was about 5 or 6 o'clock, just before the polls closed. I know it was quite dark in the hall.

"Q. What is Mr. Kelley's business?

"A. He is carrying on stone-quarry.

"Q. How many men does Mr. Kelley employ?

"A. He employs—not that I know exactly—as much as fifty men this—did last summer; I can't tell exactly.

"Q. Was Pete Diffley in the employment of Mr. Kelley?

"A. I should think he was; he had been employed for years previous to this election; he is now.

"Q. You may state whether there is more than one voting precinct at Kelley's Island or not?

"A. Only one; it is all I know of."

George P. Bristol (page 98).

"George P. Bristol, being sworn, testified as follows:

"Q. State your name in full, residence, and business.

"A. George P. Bristol; residence, Kelley's Island, Ohio; superintendent for Norman Kelley & Co.

"Q. How long have you resided on Kelly's Island, and do you still reside there?

"A. Since 1860 permanently, and I still live there.

"Q. What is Mr. Norman Kelley's business?

"A. He is carrying on the stone-quarrying and grape-growing.

"Q. How many men had Mr. Kelley in his employment at the time of the October election, held October 14, 1884?

"A. As near as I can recollect, somewhere between fifty and sixty men.

"Q. Were you familiar and did you meet frequently the men engaged in his employment?

"A. I was familiar with them, and met them frequently every day.

"Q. You may state what, if anything, the men employed by Mr. Kelley said to you that Mr. Kelley had said or done to them to influence their vote at the Congressional election held in October last.

"(Attorney for contestee objects to this question.)

"A. He had told them that they should not vote for Mr. Hurd, or ought not to vote for Mr. Hurd. The men told me this. I did not hear Mr. Kelley say this.

"Q. You may state what he said to the men.

"A. The men told me that Mr. Kelley said to them that they ought not to vote for Mr. Hurd because he was a free-trader, and that free trade would ruin his business; that if Mr. Cleveland and Hurd were elected that we would have free trade, and he would be forced to discharge some of his men. He told one of the men, who told me, that if we had free trade those who voted the Democratic ticket would be the first to go. Only one man told me this.

"Q. Does Mr. Kelley take an active interest in political matters?

"A. Not generally.

"Q. Was he active in political matters at the time of the October elections, 1884?

"A. He was on the day of election.

"Q. You may state what Mr. Kelley did on the day of election.

"A. I really could not state. I was on the board. There was a large crowd in the room and I was busy writing.

"Q. In what capacity did you act at that election?

"A. Was one of the clerks of the board.

"Q. At what time did you first notice Mr. Kelley about the voting place?

"A. I think he was down and voted early in the morning; am not positive.

"Q. Did he remain during the day?

"A. I think not.

"Q. When did you next notice him around the polls?

"A. It was some time in the afternoon. It may have been 4 o'clock, or it may have been still later. It was some time late in the afternoon.

"Q. After what time did the men employed by him vote?

"A. I should say between 5 and 6 o'clock p. m.

"Q. Did Lester Carpenter or John Woodford, at any time during the day of that election, to your knowledge, go to the quarry and request Mr. Kelley to come to the polls?

"A. I don't know anything about whether they did or not.

"Q. Do you know whether anybody on that day went to the quarry and made that request?

"A. I do not."

Michael Hughes:

"Michael Hughes, being sworn, testified as follows:

"Question. State your name in full.

"Answer. Michael Hughes.

"Q. State your business and place of residence.

"A. Reside on Kelley's Island; my business is farming.

"Q. You may state if you were present at the polls at the election held on the 14th of October last.

"A. I was.

"Q. Do you know Norman Kelley?

"A. I do.

"Q. Do you know the men in the employ of Norman Kelley?

"A. I could not say I know them all. I know some of them.

"Q. You may state whether Mr. Kelley was present at the voting place at the election held on the 14th of October last.

"A. I did not notice him in the forenoon. He was there in the afternoon pretty much all the time.

"Q. You may state what Mr. Kelley was doing at the polls that day.

"A. I did not see him electioneering with anybody but his own men. He stood at the door of the hall where they went in to vote; told his men he would like to see their tickets. Some showed them, some did not. I did not know that he wanted them to scratch anybody but Frank H. Hurd.

"Q. Do you know how Mr. Kelley came to be at the polls in the afternoon?

"A. My reason is, he was very strongly opposed to Frank Hurd's election. I do not know any other reason. It was a very unusual thing to see Mr. Kelley at the polls.

"Q. You may state whether or not Mr. Kelley was very bitter in his opposition to Mr. Hurd.

"A. He worked very hard against Mr. Hurd with his own men. I objected once to his electioneering with his men in the building where they were voting. He told me it was none of my business. I said no more to him."

A. P. Duysing (page 152):

"Mr. A. P. Duysing, of lawful age, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

"Question. State your name, residence, and occupation.

"Answer. A. P. Duysing; Kelley's Island; am a saloon-keeper.

"Q. How long have you lived on the island, Mr. Duysing?

"A. Twenty-six years.

"Q. Were you on the island about the time of the October election, 1884?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. State what you know, if anything, of any conversations about the time of said election in your place of business in regard to any intimidation by any person.

"A. All I know is, I heard some of Norman Kelley's men say that he tried to intimidate them, but to mention names I can not recollect. That's the truth. I heard it several times.

"Q. What is your impression as to the time; was it before or after election?

"A. Soon after election.

"Q. Mr. Duysing, were you at the polls that day?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Give the time when you came there, as near as you remember, and state how long you remained there.

"A. Came there at 6 in the morning and left at half past 6 in the morning.

"Q. Did you see Mr. Norman Kelley at the polls when you were there?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Now, Mr. Duysing, state if you know or heard of Norman Kelley's being at the polls for the purpose of intimidation at said election.

"A. Certainly I heard that.

"Q. About how long did you hear he was there?

"A. I don't know.

"Q. Did you hear of his intimidating or attempting to intimidate any one?

"A. I did not hear Mr. Kelley say so himself.

"Q. Did you hear any one say that Mr. Norman Kelley intimidated or attempted to intimidate any one?

"A. I heard several persons say so in my saloon."

Homer H. Woodford (p. 153):

"Question. State your name, residence, and occupation.

"Answer. Homer H. Woodford; am a grape-grower and carpenter; reside on Kelley's Island.

"Q. How long have you lived on the island?

"A. About forty-four years.

"Q. Were you on the island at the time of the State election in October, 1884?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were you present at the polls on the day of said election; and, if so, at what time did you come to the polls, and how long did you remain there?

"A. I was there; came at the opening of the polls at 6 o'clock, and remained there until the polls closed, excepting about three hours.

"Q. When did these three hours come in?

"A. From 10 till 1 in the afternoon.

"Q. Did you see Mr. Norman Kelley at the polls?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you hear Mr. Norman Kelley make any remarks to any of his employés during said day?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. State, according to the best of your recollection, what the substance of any remark was which Mr. Norman Kelley made and to whom he addressed it.

"A. He addressed the remark to several of the parties that were with him. He made the remark to some men that passed along, 'You will be one of the first ones that will have to go.'

"Q. Before said election did you know or hear of Mr. Norman Kelley attempting to influence any voter to vote the Republican ticket?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Can you recollect the names of any of the men to whom Mr. Kelley addressed this remark? If so, give them.

"A. One of them was Mr. Casey that was in the crowd together. That is the only name I can give; the others I know when I see them.

"Q. How many others were there as you remember?

"A. There were four or five as they came back from voting.

"Q. Now, Mr. Woodford, please state what, in your opinion, was the motive of Mr. Kelley in making this remark.

"A. I should suppose it was because they did not vote to suit him; I don't know what else it could be. That is my opinion.

"Q. Please state whether or not there was a general opinion in the island that Mr. Kelley was attempting to influence his employés.

"A. I have no way of knowing that.

"Q. Have you ever heard such a statement made either before or after this election?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, Mr. Woodford, please state how it was you happened to be so long at the polls on the day of said election.

"A. I had a cut foot—crippled.

"Cross-examination by Mr. SCHENCK:

"Q. You say that you never heard Mr. Norman Kelley speak to any of his employés about their voting before the election, and that all you heard him say was after Casey had voted. He said to him, 'You will be one of the first ones to go.' Now, what time of the day was it that Norman Kelley said this to Casey, and was it inside or outside of the building where the voting took place?

"A. It was not far from 5 o'clock p. m.; it might have been a little before or a little after. This was said to Casey inside the hall."

Jacob Rauft (page 155):

"Q. State your name, residence, and occupation.

"A. Jacob Rauft; Kelley's Island; am a cobbler.

"Q. How long have you lived on Kelley's Island?

"A. As long as I have lived.

"Q. Were you in Kelley's Island at the time of the last election?

"A. Yes; I voted.

"Q. You mean the State election for Congressman, in October, 1884, do you?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. State what, if anything, you know in regard to Mr. Norman Kelley taking a ticket from a voter on the day of said election.

"A. Well, what I know about is this: I went up to vote some time in the afternoon, and I seen Mr. Norman Kelley standing there looking at a ticket. Whether it was a Republican ticket or a Democratic ticket I don't know. That's all I know about it. I don't know where he went or anybody else. I went to vote.

"Q. Did you, or did you not, see him take the ticket from any person?

"A. I did not see him take it; I don't know whether the man showed it to him or he took it; he was looking at it; that's all I saw.

"Q. Give the name of the man.

"A. Anwander, I think, was his name."

We think this testimony clearly shows that Mr. Kelley intended to intimidate his employés, that he made the men acquainted with his purpose, and that he carried it out by his presence and conduct at the polls on election day.

It is urged by counsel for contestee that the proof does not show that; the intimidation is not shown to have made the result different from what it otherwise might have been. It was claimed that contestant was bound to prove that the intimidation compelled the employés to vote for contestee.

We do not think this is the law. We are of the opinion that where intimidation is practiced over men sufficient in number to affect the result the burden of proof is devolved upon him in whose interest the intimidation was done, to show that the intimidation did not affect the result. If this proof be not made, the intimidation is so interwoven with the vote that it is impossible to separate with reasonable certainty the good from the bad vote, and the whole precinct must be rejected.

In Cunningham on Elections (page 184) it is said:

"Another very important proposition of election law is established by the case, namely: That when the law has been violated and outraged, and intimidation organized, the onus is on the respondent of showing that that intimidation and violence have not produced their natural consequence."

In Rogers on Elections (page 240) it is said:

"In same case a petitioner has been called on to show that but for the riot he would have been in a majority—a course of proof which, even if the interests of the petitioner and sitting member were alone involved in the inquiry, would not be satisfactory, but the public has an interest in protecting the freedom of election (Glan., 58, 108, 118), which principle is as much violated by the intimidation and coercion of the minority as of the majority. Besides, by what course of proof is such a fact to be established? Are voters to be called to prove that but for their fears they would or they would not have voted in a particular way? How few men have courage voluntarily to admit their want of firmness on any trying occasion, and if willing to make such admission, who, speaking of his own conduct, can tell how far fear may have influenced it? Besides, if such an inquiry is to be resorted to at all, it seems reversing the order of proof to require the complaining party to show what would have been the result of the election? As soon as a serious riot has been proved, the freedom of election has been violated, prima facie; therefore the election and return are void, and it is for those who uphold the election and return to show that the disturbance did not, in fact, alter what would have been the result of the election, supposing no riot had taken place."

In the Drogheda case, 10 O'Malley and Hardcastle, page 255.

"In this case it was argued for the respondent that the onus of proof was upon the petitioner to show that undue influence was exercised by the respondent in such a way that he thereby obtained a majority, because (it was said) it was impossible for the respondent to prove the negation of this; in other words, that the respondent had the right to say to the petitioner, 'You are in a minority, and you must show that the mind of each voter who made up my majority has been unduly influenced.'"

Mr. Justice Keogh said in his judgment:

"I may say at once that the argument put forward by the respondent is one from which I wholly and entirely dissent. It is subversive in my mind of the whole principle of freedom of election. It is said by the counsel for the respondents that freedom of election is secured provided the majority are shown to have had the power of recording their vote. I deny that altogether. This was not solely a contest between the respondent and the petitioner. There is another and greater interest than belongs to either of them; there is the public interest. The humblest individual in the whole of this constituency has as good a right, without fear or intimidation, to come to the court-house on the day of election as the richest man upon the register, and as good a right as the great majority of the community."

As to the part of the argument above quoted he said:

"Even if this argument were applied to the case of bribery, it might be hard, if there was an extensively organized system, to trace it to each individual voter, and in the case of treating detection would be still more difficult. But in both these cases you have something to lay your hands upon; you have money, you have food, you have drink. But when you come to intimidating, who is there would venture to gauge its influence? Who can tell what is its effect upon the human mind?

"It is not possible to give evidence in a court of justice which would carry out the proposition which has been laid down by the counsel for the respondent here, and if at all it is to be made a matter of evidence, the onus of proof should be thrown upon them to show that when the law has been violated, when gross outrage and intimidation have been organized, that intimidation and that violence have not produced their natural consequence, namely, terrifying the people from the exercise of their legitimate practices."

The county of North Durham, 2 O'Malley and Hardcastle, page 156.

In this case the election was sought to be avoided on account of intimidation. In the county there were numerous voting precincts. In some of them it did not appear that intimidation was practiced. Mr. Baron Bramwell decided that if the majorities in the precincts affected were not sufficient to change the general result, while the election would be void in the precincts affected, yet the sitting member would not be disturbed. If, however, they did affect the majority, the sitting member would be unseated.

In the course of the opinion Mr. Baron Bramwell said:

"But besides this [statutory intimidation] there is another intimidation that has been called a common-law intimidator, and it applies to a case where the intimidation is of such a character, so general and extensive in its operation, that it can not be said that the polling was a fair representation of the opinion of the constituency. If the intimidation was local or partial—for instance, if in this case it had been limited to one district, as Hetton is, I have no doubt that in that case it would have been wrong to have set aside this election, because one could have seen to demonstration that the result could not possibly have been brought about by that intimidation, and that the result would not have been different if it had not existed. I do not mean the result of the polling in that particular district, but the general result of the majority for the respondent. But when it is of such a general character that the result may have been affected, in my judgment it is no part of the duty of a judge to enter into a kind of scrutiny to see whether possibly, or probably even, as a matter of conclusion upon the evidence, if that intimidation had not [been] exerted, the result would have been different. What the judge has to do in that case is to say that the burden of proof is cast upon the constituency whose conduct is incriminated, and unless it can be shown that the gross amount of intimidation could not possibly have affected the result of the election, it ought to be declared void. * * * Besides, I am of the opinion that where there has been so large an amount of intimidation that it is uncertain whether the result would have been the same without it, it can not be said that the election was free, or that it represented the real opinion of the constituency, but that it must be held void on account of that intimidation."

The same doctrine has been approved by this House in the case of Ford vs. Abbott and Goode vs. Platt, in the Forty-fourth Congress. In these cases the poll of the precincts where the navy-yard vote was cast was thrown out on account of intimidation practiced by the officers in the yard. The burden of proof was held to be upon the contestee to show that the violation of the law had not affected the result.

The contestee has failed to show that the intimidation practiced in his interest did not affect the result, and as that intimidation was great enough to affect the majority in the precinct, we are of the opinion that the return from this precinct should be excluded.

PRECINCT C, WARD 3, TOLEDO.

Here the vote was 319 for contestee and 153 for contestant.

In this precinct the testimony shows that Robert H. Bell, not an officer of the election, repeatedly put his hands into the ballot-box, while the count was going on, and handled the ballots, in several instances taking them out and placing them upon the table.

Mr. Bell is shown to be a partisan Republican, taking an active interest in politics and the management of elections.

The testimony of one clerk of the election, David Emerick, is offered to show that this interference was made with the ballots by Mr. Bell. He is corroborated by Judge Potter, the Democratic judge, who reproved Bell for his unwarranted handling of the ballots.

The contestee puts Mr. Bell upon the stand, who denies that he in any way interfered with the ballots at the October election, but admits that he did at the November election.

It is attempted to sustain his testimony by the evidence of one Republican judge, Mr. Waterman, and the Republican clerk, Mr. Wilhelm. The other judge, Mr. Kirk, is not produced as a witness. Both these witnesses admitted that Mr. Bell attempted to take the ballots out of the box at one of the two elections, for which Judge Potter reproved him. Mr. Waterman says that he had an indefinite recollection of something occurring at the November election (page 222). The other says (page 271):

"I don't know whether it was at the October or November election that he [Mr. Bell] attempted to remove ballots from the box, but at that time Judge Potter interceded and told him not to do so. My impression is that it was in November, but it might have been in October."

These uncertain impressions of these two witnesses can not overcome the positive and clear statement of Mr. Emerick that Mr. Bell did repeatedly take tickets out of the box and handle them at the October election before the counting was done.

If, however, any doubt existed upon this point it is removed by the testimony of Mr. C. A. Smith (page 146) and George B. Boone (page 145).

These witnesses both testify that on the next evening after the October election Mr. Emerick told them that Mr. Bell had interfered with the ballots the day before while the counting was going on, handled them in the box, and took them out and placed them on the table. He also showed them how easy it would be for a person, under such circumstances, to perpetrate a fraud, and said that there ought to be Democrats at the poll at the November election to prevent a repetition of such acts. Mr. Smith said that he would be present, and at the November election was present and watched the counting until the ballots had all been taken from the box and until Mr. Bell left the room. He said that Mr. Bell did not in any way interfere with the ballots at the November election.

The testimony establishes beyond all doubt that the handling of the ballots was done by Mr. Bell at the October election. As, therefore, the attempt of the contestee to explain the conduct of Mr. Bell has failed, the statement of Mr. Emerick must be accepted as true, with all the presumptions against Mr. Bell's conduct and the contestee.

We submit the testimony of David Emerick, which we think is fully corroborated by the other evidence.

David Emerick (page 11):

"Q. What is your name, and where do you reside?

"A. David Emerick; I reside in Precinct C, third ward, Toledo.

"Q. In what capacity did you act at the State election held on the 14th of October last?

"A. Clerk at the election.

"Q. Were you present at the poll during the whole day?

"A. I was; all [day], with the exception of going to dinner and to supper.

"Q. Who were the judges of election, and who was your associate clerk?

"A. Emory Potter, sr., was one judge; Waterman (I don't know what his initials are), and Kirk (I don't know what his initials are); those were the judges. H. W. Wilhelm was the other clerk.

"Q. Who kept your poll-books while you were absent at dinner? State if you know.

"A. I don't know who kept them.

"Q. Were they kept in the handwriting of your associate, Mr. Wilhelm.

"A. They were not.

"Q. Were you present when the polls were closed and the opening of the ballot-boxes occurred?

"A. I was.

"Q. You may go on and state in what manner the ballots were taken from the box and counted, and what occurred worthy of note in process of counting.

"A. Mr. Kirk unlocked the ticket-box and threw probably one hundred and fifty or one hundred and seventy-five tickets on the table, and the judges proceeded to open them up and assort them. They open up and assort them by piling the straight Republican tickets on one pile, the scratched Republican tickets on another pile, the straight Democratic tickets on one pile, and the scratched Democratic tickets on one pile. While they were assorting those tickets Mr. Kirk took out of the box and put on the table, a man they call Bob Bell took his position at the head of the table, standing up, leaning on the ballot-box, and as the tickets were exhausted which Mr. Kirk threw out, this man Bell would take them out of the box and throw them on the table. He would continue that as often as the tickets were exhausted. I can't tell how many times he did this.

"Q. What was his position with reference to the ballot-box and the officers of the election?

"A. The ballot-box stood on the end of the table; Mr. Waterman, the Republican judge, sat on the right at the side of the table, and Mr. Kirk sat on the left at the side of the table. The Republican judge, Mr. Potter, sat next to Mr. Kirk and I sat next to Mr. Waterman. Mr. Wilhelm sat next to me. Mr. Bell stood at the head of the table with his arm on the ballot-box, and as the tickets would exhaust he would put his hand in the ballot-box and put them on the table as the judges would sort them out.

"Q. What, if anything, was said by you or any one else at the time as to that course of procedure?

"A. I think Mr. Potter said something to him; I don't remember what it was. I made the remark that it wasn't according to law to count out tickets in that way. Mr. Bell says, 'That is the way we always counted them here; sorted them out and counted them afterward.' I told him that I didn't care how they had done; I didn't think it was the proper way to do it. In reply he said he forgot more about elections than I ever knew. I told him that it didn't make any difference to me; that there were three judges sworn to count the votes and that I had nothing to say about it, neither had he, as I was merely a clerk there.

"Q. How many times did Mr. Bell open the box and take the ballots out, approximately?

"A. Several times; I don't remember just how many. I think he took all the tickets, with the exception of those that Mr. Kirk took out first.

"Q. How many tickets would you say, then, that Mr. Bell handled?

"A. I couldn't say the number, because Mr. Kirk took out a handful. I think that Mr. Kirk took out about one hundred and seventy-five or two hundred; there might have been more and there might have been less, and Mr. Bell threw the balance of the tickets on the table.

"Q. To what political party does Mr. Bell belong?

"A. He is a Republican, I think.

"Q. State, if you know, whether or not he has been an active Republican politician in this city.

"A. He has that reputation.

"Q. State whether or not the tickets were all taken from the box one by one.

"A. They were not.

"Q. How were the tickets counted from these assorted piles of which you have spoken?

"A. They were counted in fives; the Republican straight tickets were counted first, and then the Democratic straight tickets were counted; then the scratched were counted in the same way, i. e., they were counted one by one."

Same witness (page 137):

David Emerick, of lawful age, being by me duly sworn, as hereinbefore certified, deposes and says:

"Q. You are the same David Emerick, are you, whose deposition has been heretofore taken in this matter by the contestant?

"A. I am.

"Q. You may state who took the tickets from the ballot-box at the time of the October election of 1884 just prior to their being counted.

"(Question objected to as not being rebuttal.)

"A. Robert Bell and Kirk.

"Q. Who was Mr. Kirk that you refer to?

"A. He was one of the judges.

"Q. Did Mr. Waterman, one of the judges of election, take any tickets from the ballot-box?

"(Question objected to for the reason that the same is leading and not rebuttal.)

"A. He did not.

"Q. You may state what occurrence, if any, enables you to determine definitely that the facts that you stated in your former deposition in this case occurred at the October election of 1884, and not at the November election of that year.

"(Question objected to as not being rebuttal.)

"A. The next night after the October election I related to Mr. C. A. Smith and Mr. Boone what Mr. Bell had done the evening before while we were counting out the votes. Mr. Smith asked me if there wasn't anybody there to look after the Democratic party's interest besides me and Judge Potter. I told him there were not; so he said he would see that there would be somebody there next election; so he came up to the polls in November, and remained there while we were counting out the vote.

"(Answer objected to as not being rebuttal, and being incompetent and immaterial.)

"Q. Was Mr. Smith, whom you refer to, present during the counting of the vote in Precinct C, third ward, at the October election of 1884?

"(Objected to as immaterial and not rebuttal.)

"A. He was not present.

"Q. At what time did he reach the polls at the time of the November election of 1884?

"(Question objected to as immaterial and not rebuttal.)

"A. I should judge about half past 6 or 7 o'clock.

"Q. State in what way, if any, Robert H. Bell interfered at the time of the October election, 1884, in Precinct C of the third ward, with the work of the judges and clerks in polling and counting the vote of that election.

"(Question objected to as leading and not rebuttal.)

"A. He took tickets out of the ballot-box, put them on the table, took my polling-sheet, and wrote a lot of names while I was gone to dinner."

The only explanation of the conduct of Bell, as already stated, attempted was to show that the tampering with the box occurred in November. We are of opinion that contestee has failed in the explanation. The act of Bell is therefore without anything to extenuate or justify it.

In all elections the most important thing to be shown is that the votes counted were those cast. There can be no assurance of this fact, except that the ballots have been preserved in the exclusive custody of the officers charged with the duty of keeping them. Any interference with them by an unauthorized person, any handling or taking them into possession by others than the proper officers, whereby an opportunity to tamper with them and alter them has been given, will be fatal to the count, unless the clearest and most satisfactory explanation has been made of the conduct of such persons. The burden is shifted to the contestee to show that what was done did not interfere with the ascertainment of the true result. This doctrine is declared in Duffy's case, supra, where it is said:

"Besides, where the officers of an election board, as shown by the evidence in this case, have, either through design or ignorance, neglected to comply with some of the essential requirements of the law, * * * presumption in favor of the legality, fairness, and regularity of the election predicated upon a return and tally-sheet ought not to weigh heavily with a tribunal seeking to vindicate and administer the law. The burden of proof must be shifted to the other side. Those who are advantaged by such an election must show affirmatively its general fairness, otherwise it will become the duty of the court to throw it out altogether."

Here no proof was offered upon this point by the contestee, except to attempt to show that the interference with the ballots by Mr. Bell occurred at the November election. This attempt having failed, the conduct of Mr. Bell remains without extenuation, indeed fuller of suspicion because of the effort to set up a false explanation of it.

The rule of the law in disposing of a return made where the ballots have been taken from the custody of the proper officers is laid down in a case decided in the New York senate, hereafter cited.

The penalty for interference with ballots in Ohio before counting is very severe.

Section 7059 of the Revised Statutes provides:

"Whoever at any election unlawfully, either by force, fraud, or other improper means, obtains or attempts to obtain possession of any ballot-box, or any ballots therein deposited, while the voting at such election is going on, or before the ballots are duly taken out of such ballot-box and enumerated by the judges of the election, according to law, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not more than three years nor less than one year."

The act here prohibited is not merely the fraudulent taking possession of ballots, but the illegal taking of them by any improper means. This shows the view in which the Ohio statute holds the giving of any opportunity to unauthorized persons to tamper with the votes.

The New York case above referred to is the case of Cary vs. Twombly, New York Contested-Election Cases, page 474.

There it is said:

"The irregularity urged before the committee on protest of the board of canvassers, and * * * before the committee of this house, in relation to the eighteenth district of the sixteenth ward, consists in the fact that Mr. William Terhune, a person not an inspector, participated in the canvass of the votes for members of assembly, and performed acts and duties allowed by law to be performed only by an inspector of election.

"The fact of the participation of the said Terhune in handling the ballots before they were opened was * * * fully established before your committee. It was also shown by the evidence. * * *

"It also appeared that a person occupying the position of Mr. Terhune, and handling the ballots as he was known to have handled them, could have substituted ballots of the contesting member for the sitting member. In other words, that he could have substituted one ballot for another. It further appeared before your committee that said Terhune was a friend and partisan of the contestant, and a Republican in politics, holding the position of Republican supervisor under the late statutes of the United States relating to elections. It further appeared that said Terhune took no part in the canvass of the general or Congressional ballots, but only took part in the canvass of the assembly ballots. It was not pretended or claimed that Terhune's appointment by Judge Woodruff as a United States supervisor gave him any authority to interfere or take part in the canvass of the assembly ballots.

* * * "While your committee do not desire to cast any imputation on Mr. Terhune more than appears in the evidence, your committee can not fail to suggest that while Mr. Terhune had an opportunity to appear and testify before the committee, * * * and was also subpœnaed, * * * in both instances he has failed to present himself to make any excuse or explanation for his participation in the canvass of the assembly ballots of the eighteenth district of the sixteenth ward.

"Your committee have carefully considered the evidence on this branch of the case, and while they would be unwilling to reject any poll upon mere technicalities, yet in the case of the poll of the eighteenth district of the sixteenth ward, in the judgment of your committee, the violation of the law in allowing Mr. Terhune, not an inspector, to handle the votes of member of assembly is palpable, as it offered an opportunity for the commission of fraud.

"Your committee, therefore, upon due deliberation, have rejected the poll or votes for each of the parties in said district, which are as follows:"

After quoting the statutes of New York prohibiting persons from interfering with the canvass of votes:

"There is a distinct and positive prohibition against all persons from engaging in * * * the canvass or estimate of votes, except inspectors of election and poll clerks. Can it be pretended that the act of Terhune * * * was not a direct violation of the statute, and being so, the propriety of throwing out the poll of that district can not, with due regard to the right of suffrage, be for one moment questioned. * * * It seems to your committee that it would be a most dangerous precedent to establish, that the chairman of a board of inspectors, or even a majority of the board, can call in any person to canvass the votes. If they can call in one, they can call in two, five, or ten. Under such a construction of the law, what security would there be to the ballot?"

This report was signed by Hon. David B. Hill, present governor of the State of New York.

All of the remarks contained in it apply, with at least equal force, to the case under consideration. This indeed would seem to be a stronger case, because of the attempt to set up a false explanation of the conduct of the person who interfered with the ballots.

It is urged that Mr. Bell was a man of good reputation, and that this of itself should rebut the presumption that his conduct affected the result. The same plea was urged for Terhune in the case just cited, but it availed him nothing.

While the testimony as to his reputation might have great weight in case he were on trial under indictment for his unlawful act, it will avail contestee nothing in this inquiry. The law requires him to show affirmatively that Bell's unlawful act did not affect the result of that election. This can not be done by showing Bell's good reputation, especially as we find in this case that he has attempted to make a false explanation of the conduct complained of.

ILLEGAL VOTES IN THE CITY OF TOLEDO.

In the direct examination of his witnesses the contestant presented the names of three hundred and forty-seven persons who had voted in the different precincts of Toledo, who were claimed to be illegal voters.

It was proven as to these that they had voted at the October State election, and had not voted at the November Presidential election, a few weeks afterward. A thorough comparison was made between the poll-books of the two elections in each precinct, and in nearly all there were found many who had voted at the first and not at the second election.

Lists were prepared of the names of these voters and put into the hands of people living in the precinct. These persons were placed upon the stand to testify as to whether those whose names had been given them were electors or not in the precincts where they had voted. The witnesses called upon from each precinct were persons who were residents; had in some cases lived many years there, and in many cases had been born there; were acquainted with the people; had been doing business with them, and had held offices, such as assessors and councilmen, among them. Besides, they had taken the lists and called in from the neighborhood a number of prominent persons from every part of it to consider the names. They made comparison with the directory, and in most cases went personally from house to house to learn whether the parties were voters.

With this information, possessed as to each precinct, the witnesses went upon the stand and testified that the three hundred and forty-seven persons were not residents of the precinct at the time of October election, and were not legal voters there at that time. This testimony will be found on pages 18, 20, 22, 24, 26, 31, 40, 47, 50, 53, 56, 60, 62, 64, 82, 84, 89, 93, 102, 106, 108, 111, and 113.

This testimony is entirely competent, and always makes out a prima facie case against the votes claimed to be illegal. This doctrine is well settled.

In Blair vs. Barrett, May 22, 1860 (1 Bartlett, 30), it is said:

"Many voters were charged to be non-residents—some of the State, and more of the particular precinct in which they voted. The very nature of the charge shows the difficulty of the proof. It involves to a great extent proof of a negation respecting persons whose names are not even known, and, except in a few instances where there may be a personal acquaintance with the man in another State, or in a distant part of the same State, the proof can hardly be, from the nature of the case, of a positive and direct character. In these cases the committee based their conclusions upon evidence that these men had never voted in that precinct before; were strangers to the old residents of the precinct, to individuals who had acted as judges and clerks of election for a great number of years; had no home or business in the precinct known to their best acquaintance, its home and business, and that they have disappeared from the day of the election, their whereabouts not having been discovered since even by the canvass-takers. With this evidence on the one side so easy of rebuttal by the production of the voter, if a resident, or of some one else who knew him to be a resident, yet left uncontradicted, the committee could come to no other conclusion than to reject all such voters as illegal."

It is competent for the contestant to prove that search had been made for persons alleged to have voted illegally, and the result thereof, but what was said at a peculiar time is not evidence. (Brightly, page 414.)

Section 356 in McCrary, page 301, is as follows:

"For the purpose of showing that non-residents have voted, witnesses are often called to testify that persons whose names appear upon the roll as having voted are not known to them as residents of the county or voting precinct, as the case may be. This kind of evidence is admissible for what it is worth; but it is manifest that its value must depend upon circumstances. If the district or territory within which the voter must reside is large or very populous, and the witness has not an intimate and extensive acquaintance with the inhabitants, the evidence will be of little value, and, standing alone, will avail nothing. But on the other hand, if such district or territory is not large or populous, and if the witness shows that his acquaintance with the inhabitants is such that he could scarcely fail to know any person who may have resided therein long enough to become a voter, his evidence may be quite satisfactory, especially if it further appears that soon after the election the alleged non-resident voter could not be found in the district within the limits of which all voters must reside. Proof of this character must at least be regarded sufficient to shift the burden upon the parties desiring that the vote of such alleged non-resident be counted, and require him to show affirmatively that he is a bona fide resident."

The contestee recognized the force of the rule of the law and accepted the onus of the proof, and undertook to show that the persons whose names were presented by the contestant were not illegal voters, but possessed the qualifications necessary to make them electors at the various precincts where they voted.

It is claimed that many of the persons alleged to have voted illegally were Germans, whose names were misspelled by the clerks of the election on the poll-books. In some other precincts the same thing occurred. But, allowing for all mistakes of this kind, and for all proved by the contestee to be actual residents of Toledo and the precincts where they polled, we find that contestant shows that there were 212 illegal votes cast in Toledo at that election.

In the list of names printed in the majority report this was true. This was a Democratic precinct, giving a large majority for contestant, where contestee was able to show in this way that few illegal votes were cast.

It is admitted that there is no evidence to prove for whom these votes were given.

The question thus directly presented is, What disposition shall be made in a contested election of illegal votes where there is no proof as to how they were cast?

McCrary says that there are three methods of disposing of such votes. These are—

(1) To declare the election void; i. e., the election at the precinct where the illegal votes were cast; (2) to subtract the votes from each proportionally, and (3) to deduct them from the majority.

In disposing of these ballots we think that each precinct should take care of its own illegal vote. Where an election is declared void, it should be that held in the precinct where the illegal votes are cast. This is the rule laid down in the case of Goode vs. Platt, page 679:

"When illegal or fraudulent votes have been proven, and the poll can not be purged with reasonable certainty, the whole vote must be rejected."

Where the illegal votes are not numerous enough to change the result in the precinct, they must either be subtracted from the candidate proportionally or deducted from the majority.

The first method is unsatisfactory. It is practically dividing the illegal votes between the candidates, upon the principle that the illegal voters have voted as the lawful voters did. This is not a fair presumption, as from the fact that large numbers of illegal votes are cast in a precinct it may well be inferred that it was intended by those who cast them to prevent the natural division of the votes from being effectual. Besides, when the majority in a precinct for a candidate is small, it would require a very large illegal vote to affect the result; i. e., under this rule large numbers of illegal votes could be cast with impunity, providing they left only a small majority for the successful candidate.

We think that the rule of deducting the votes from the majority candidate in each precinct is the correct one. It is on this theory only that the election can be avoided where there are enough illegal votes to affect the result.

It will make each candidate take care of his own precinct. It will make it for the interest of judges to prevent illegal votes which may injure their friends. It will cause that candidate to lose the votes who through his friends might have prevented their being cast.

This rule is approved in the case of Le Moyne vs. Farwell, Digest of 1871, page 442, and Goode vs. Platt, Digest of 1871, page 686.

In Commonwealth vs. McCloskey, Brightly's Cases, page 211; in Marblehead case, reported in Cushing's Manual, Election Cases; and in In vs. Duffy, 4 Brewster, page 173.

The doctrine is also approved in Massachusetts Reports of Contested Elections, pages 52, 63.

In the recent case of In vs. Barker, 10 Phila., 596, the syllabus is as follows:

"When legal and illegal votes have been counted indiscriminately and a majority have resulted in various districts, embraced in the general return, whether for one candidate or the other, the only means whereby even approximate justice may be reached is to requre him for whose advantages such majority inure to lift the curse which the law has imposed upon the illegal ballots; otherwise they will be deducted from his count."

Applying this rule, we find that contestee will lose 135 votes and contestant 56, making a total of 79 votes, after the polls are purged, to be deducted from the vote of the sitting member.

From the following precincts in Toledo, which gave a majority for Mr. Romeis, the following deductions should be made:

From Precinct A, ward 2	22
From Precinct B, ward 2	11
From Precinct C, ward 2	4
From Precinct A, ward 3	29
From Precinct B, ward 3	13
From Precinct C, ward 3	7
From Precinct B, ward 4	10
From Precinct C, ward 5	12
From Precinct B, ward 7	12
From Precinct C, ward 8	15
	135

From the following precincts in Toledo, which gave Mr. Hurd a majority, the following deductions should be made:

From Precinct A, ward 4	14
From Precinct C, ward 4	6
From Precinct A, ward 5	14
From Precinct B, ward 5	9
From Precinct A, ward 7	3
From Precinct A, ward 8	10
	56

The views we have expressed will result in the following change in the count:

Exclude Precinct B, eighth ward, Toledo	220
Kelley's Island	29
Precinct C, third ward, Toledo	166
	415
Deduct also illegal votes in Toledo	79
	494
Deduct contestee's majority	239
	255

We therefore find that the majority for contestant is 255.

We therefore offer for adoption the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Jacob Romeis was not elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

Resolved, That Frank H. Hurd was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

Respectfully submitted.

THOMAS A. ROBERTSON.
JOHN S. HENDERSON.
THOMAS CROXTON.
JOHN M. MARTIN.

Mr. R. S. GREEN, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the following as the views of a portion of the minority:

The undersigned, being unable to entirely agree with the conclusions and recommendations of the majority, or of the minority presented by Mr. ROBERTSON, submit the following:

In our judgment the certificate of the judges of Precinct B, eighth ward of the city of Toledo, is successfully impeached. We must, therefore, resort to other evidence to ascertain if possible the true result of the election in that precinct. The testimony taken shows that the ballots, after the close of the election, instead of being taken one by one from the ballot-box, counted, and strung, as required by law, were emptied upon the table, opened, classified, bunched in fives of straight tickets, the scratched ones also assorted, and then counted and recounted with ever-varying result as to the aggregate number; at one time there being 7 more than the names on the poll-book, and finally 4 less than the proper number, and after this handling, "those that were left," in the words of one witness, were returned to the box, to be taken out and canvassed as required by law.

The statutes of Ohio are ample to secure accuracy of count and certainty of determination. It is true that their provisions are directory and their disregard not sufficient, of itself, to avoid an election. But this violation is not now invoked for such purpose. We are in search of reliable testimony outside the certificate to ascertain with reasonable certainty what was the vote for each candidate. The final count might furnish this if these irregularities did not raise a suspicion, and the actual loss of eleven ballots did not conclusively show that they had been tampered with. If twelve, how many more? In the light of this testimony there is no certainty that the ballots at last counted were those which were deposited in the box by the voters, and we are without evidence to remove the uncertainty. In this emergency there is no other course to pursue than to reject the poll.

The evidence, in our opinion, shows that enough illegal votes were cast at other points in the district to affect the result after the elimination of the poll at Precinct B, eighth ward, city of Toledo. There is no proof whatever in the case for whom such illegal votes were cast. We are unable to agree with either the majority or minority in their conclusions as to what should be done with this vote.

McCrary, in his work on elections, second edition, page 265, says:

"In a legislative body having power to order a new election, or in any other tribunal having the same power, it will doubtless, generally, be regarded as safer and more conducive to the ends of justice to order such new election than to reach a result by the application of the rule just stated, [namely, to deduct the illegal votes proportionately from both candidates, according to the entire vote returned for each. He continues:] It would seem, therefore, that in a case where the number of bad votes proven is sufficient to affect the result, and in the absence of any evidence to enable the court to determine for whom they were cast, the court must decide upon one of the three following alternatives, namely:

"(1) Declare the election void.

"(2) Divide the illegal votes between the candidates in proportion to the whole vote of each.

"(3) Deduct the illegal vote from the candidate having the highest vote.

"And it is clear, also, that where in such a case no great public inconvenience would result from declaring the election void and seeking a decision by an appeal to the electors, that course should be adopted."

In our opinion the present is eminently a case for the application of this rule. The testimony in the case, while it does not in our judgment go to the extent of establishing that the contestant received a sufficient number of the legal votes cast to justify a decision that he was elected and is entitled to his seat, does show on the part of the adherents of the sitting member such a violation of the safeguards prescribed by the statutes of Ohio to protect the ballot-box and secure a correct count of the ballots cast, and a determination of the true result, an attempt at least on the part of an employer to interfere with the free exercise of the elective franchise by those in his employment, as well as a resort to practices which, if not constituting bribery, tend to impair the purity of the ballot, and make a case where such rule should be applied.

We are of opinion that neither the said Frank H. Hurd or Jacob Romeis was lawfully elected, and recommend the passage of the following resolution declaring such determination.

ROBERT S. GREEN.
BENTON J. HALL.

Resolved, That neither Frank H. Hurd nor Jacob Romeis was lawfully elected to the Forty-ninth Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio, nor is either of them entitled to a seat in said Congress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the Chair will proceed to call the States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions. IMPROVEMENT OF COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. HERMAN also submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas the great Columbia River has a drainage area estimated at 245,000 square miles, embracing portions of Oregon, Nevada, and Washington, Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, and Montana Territories, and exceeding all the New England and Middle States, with Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia combined, and being larger than Germany or France and twice the area of Great Britain and Ireland; and

Whereas the productions of the larger portion of this immense empire must find the cheapest transportation adown the Columbia River to the high seas; and that the surplus of said productions for export from the Columbia basin alone amounted in 1884 in value to $6,000,000, and for the past year the surplus wheat export exceeded 350,000 tons, and 12,000,000 pounds of wool; and that with the vast fertile region yet unoccupied, and with immigration pouring in from the American States as well as Europe, it is estimated that in ten years the surplus grain export alone will equal 25,000,000 bushels; and

Whereas serious obstructions to Columbia River navigation exist for 13 miles in said river, extending above the city of The Dalles, in Oregon—the whole of said water way being choked by an accumulation of fixed rock and lava—and to open a channel or canal through or around the same is estimated by the United States engineers to cost $11,000,000; whereas by the construction of a ship railway the estimated cost is $1,373,000, as per report of W. A. Jones, major of United States engineers, submitted by Secretary of War to United States Senate, Executive Document No. 114, and it appears therefrom that said railway of 13 miles will connect the continuous navigation of 450 miles above and about 200 miles below to the sea; and

Whereas much doubt exists as to the practicability of the proposed Eads ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, not only as to the required strength of the railway to bear the immense weight upon it, but particularly as to the perils to the ship when loaded and with the great strain it must incur in its transportation when suspended on a car; and

Whereas the proposed ship-railway on the Columbia River in Oregon, while being a success for transportation of the smaller shipping there needed and adding permanent wealth to that section of our own nation, giving labor to our countrymen, will also demonstrate the feasibility of the proposed and more gigantic plan of isthmian ship-railway: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to report the following substitute for H. R. No. 5885:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the sum of $1,373,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for construction of a ship-railway from deep water in the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon, at the city of The Dalles, to deep water in said river at Celilo, in said State. * * *

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed to call committees for motions to suspend the rules. The call rests with the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BELMONT. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That Tuesday, May 18 next, after the expiration of the hour for the consideration of bills under clause 5 of Rule XXIV, be, and the same is hereby, set apart for the consideration of such general bills as may then be upon the Calendar of the House, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the consideration to be in the order designated by the committee, not to interfere with the general appropriation or revenue bills, and if so interfered with on that day this shall be a continuing order until one day has been occupied by said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask whether this includes reports from the Committee on Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been read. It does not.

Mr. MORRISON. Does it confine the privilege to one day?

The SPEAKER. It is confined to one day, but if interfered with on that day the resolution provides the committee shall have another day.

Mr. HENLEY. How many days?

The SPEAKER. One day.

Mr. HENLEY. And then in a certain contingency another day.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order unless a second is demanded. The question is on adopting the resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 9.

So (further count not being demanded and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

SOLDIERS' HOME, NORFOLK, VA.

The Committee on Military Affairs was called.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move that the rules be suspended, and that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4232) to reimburse the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for losses incurred through the failure of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va., and for other purposes, and that the same be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas at the time of the failure of the said bank it was one of the designated depositories of the United States, and held on deposit from the treasurer of the National Home, in accordance with the special instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, the sum of $27,604.82; of this amount there has been refunded by dividends the sum of $7,342.36, leaving a balance of $20,262.46 due said National Home; and

Whereas the proper accounting officers, upon the advice of the Solicitor of the Treasury, have decided that the home can not be reimbursed for the balance due it from the proceeds of the sale of the bonds pledged for the security of public moneys held by said bank; and

Whereas the treasurer of said home is in no wise responsible for said loss, and it would be an act of the grossest injustice to withhold the money due to pensioners and other inmates of the home: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, or cause to be paid, to the treasurer of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers the sum of $20,262.46, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be held and expended by him as originally intended.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States to require from the president and cashier of all banks used as depositories by the treasurer of the home a deposit of bonds sufficient in amount to fully secure all moneys pertaining to said home left on deposit with any such bank.

Mr. MILLS. In order that an explanation may be given of the bill I demand a second. But I suggest that the second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and the second was considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate; fifteen in support of the proposition and fifteen against it.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask the Clerk to read the report of the committee. It gives a history of the whole case, and when it is read I am sure it will satisfy every doubting mind in the House.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY].

The report (by Mr. NEGLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House bill 4232, have carefully considered the same, and submit the following report:

The facts upon which this claim is based were found to be as follows:

Pursuant to the regulations of the board of managers and the special instructions contained in a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, a copy of which is made a part of this report—

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., November 2, 1882.

SIR: Referring to that part of your letter of the 30th ultimo, addressed to the Treasurer of the United States, in which you ask whether deposits made by the treasurers of the several branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are public moneys, I have to inform you that all moneys pertaining to the accounts with the United States of the officers referred to are public funds, and should be deposited with the Treasurer, an assistant treasurer, or a designated depository of the United States only.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

General WILLIAM B. FRANKLIN,
President National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Hartford, Conn.—

William Thompson, treasurer of the southern branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, had on deposit with the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va., April 3, 1885, the day of its failure, the sum of $27,604.82, credited to the following accounts:

For the support of the home	$2,276 73
Pension fund (unexpended)	17,419 98
Store fund	7,713 83
Posthumous fund	194 28
Total	27,604 82

There has been realized from the assets of said bank since its failure the sum of $7,342.36, leaving due the home the sum of $20,262.46, with no prospect of collecting the same.

The president of the board of managers addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury under date of June 11, 1885, requesting that the said balance should be made good by the bank. Again, on July 31, 1885, he submitted a brief of the case to the Secretary of the Treasury, asking speedy action. The subject-matter was referred by the Secretary to the Solicitor of the Treasury for an opinion. This officer decided that the unpaid balance due the home could not be legally paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds heretofore pledged for the security of public moneys by the bank. The president of the board of managers filed exceptions to this decision, and received in reply the following:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 28, 1885.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 23d instant, requesting that there be referred to the Department of Justice all the papers in the matter of the decision of this Department that the pension-money of pensioners of the Southern Branch of National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va., when that public depository failed, is not public money.

In reply you are informed that the receiver of the bank having formally protested against the payment of this account from the proceeds of the sale of the United States bonds held in trust as security for public deposits, the matter was referred to the Solicitor of the Treasury for his opinion as to whether it would be proper for me to pay from the proceeds of the sales of the security bonds the amount standing on the books of the bank to the credit of the treasurer of the home.

The Solicitor, after three times carefully considering the matter, decided that only $2,276.73, the amount to the credit of the National Home for which returns were rendered to the Department, could be so paid. This amount was paid in full from the proceeds and the remainder turned over to the Comptroller of the Currency for the benefit of the creditors and merged with the general funds of the bank.

Since then the Comptroller has paid the first dividend of 20 per cent. on claims proved against the Exchange National Bank, including those of Mr. William Thompson, treasurer, as follows, namely:

	Amount of claim.	Dividend of 20 per cent.
Pension fund	$17,419 98	$3,484 00
Home store	7,713 83	1,542 77
Dead soldiers' effects	194 28	38 86
Trustee Robert Mallow	513 75	102 75
Trustee Charles Schott	105 75	21 15

Having disposed of the proceeds of the bonds, and the treasurer of the home having received the first dividend of 20 per cent., I must now decline to refer the papers to the Attorney-General, as requested by you.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

General WILLIAM B. FRANKLIN,
President of the Board of Managers
National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Hartford, Conn.

It will appear from the tenor of the Secretary's letter that the present system of making deposits of the funds of the Home with United States depositories is defective and open to misuse and misconstruction, and that it is advisable to provide against all future emergencies of this character by requiring that all the moneys of the home deposited in public institutions should be secured by a pledge of bonds in an amount satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury. This your committee recommends.

Waiving all consideration of the view taken of the responsibility of the Exchange National Bank to pay the balance due the home out of the sale of its securities, it is conceded that the president and treasurer of the home acted in strict conformity with the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury; also, that he has shown proper vigilance in endeavoring to secure the payment of the deficit; and it is equally clear and conclusive that the beneficiaries were without any volition in the premises, and to withhold under any pretense the moneys due the old, infirm, and helpless inmates of the home, or their dependents, would be a travesty of the principles of humanity, patriotism, and common honesty.

With this view of the case your committee unhesitatingly recommend and ask for the passage of the bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. NEGLEY. This is a very simple proposition. Under the organic act establishing the Soldiers' Home the inmates are obliged to assign their pension certificate, and the moneys collected thereupon to be held by the treasurer of the home and disbursed as they require them. These moneys were deposited in the United States depository in Norfolk, and while there, outside the care or volition of the inmates or owners of the pension-moneys, they were lost. This is simply directing the reimbursement of this pension-money and also of the store fund. It would be a great wrong on these old soldiers to compel them to lose the money while in the hands of the agents of the Government.

There is no probability of their ever being paid by the bank, which failed for a very large amount. We ask this act of justice for these old soldiers. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MILLS. I understand under the law wherever public deposits are made in banks bonds are required to be deposited to secure these deposits. Now, were these deposits public deposits?

Mr. NEGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLS. Then why were not the bonds in the bank to secure them?

Mr. NEGLEY. The Secretary of the Treasury decided these were not public moneys in the sense to require the deposit of bonds, and therefore that they were not to be paid out of the proceeds of bonds pledged for the security of public moneys. For that reason we ask that instructions should be given to the Secretary of the Treasury hereafter to require bonds to be pledged for the security of this money.

Mr. MILLS. Does not the Secretary of the Treasury hold that the bonds are not sufficient to secure the public deposits in that bank?

Mr. NEGLEY. No, sir; but that they were not applicable.

Mr. MILLS. Not sufficient to cover this particular character of deposits?

Mr. NEGLEY. Yes; and he declined to refer the matter to the Attorney-General.

Mr. MILLS. Then the Secretary does not hold these are public deposits. He must hold if they are public deposits the bonds are liable. He must hold that they are private deposits.

Mr. NEGLEY. No, he does not hold that they are not public deposits, but he states that the receiver of the bank declined to admit them as part of the public moneys, and hence he declined to refer the matter to the Attorney-General because the home had received a 20 per cent. dividend.

Mr. STEELE. But the law requires that these funds shall be placed in the hands of the treasurer.

Mr. NEGLEY. Yes, under the organic act establishing the home.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, if these are private deposits, while I would regret very much that the old soldiers should lose them (if they are to be lost), yet they stand on no higher ground than the deposits in national banks of any other citizens of the United States. If they are public deposits they ought to have bonds there to secure them. That is the whole question.

Mr. NEGLEY. But I beg to state to the gentleman that the veterans had no control of their own money at all. They were compelled by the organic act establishing the home to transfer their certificates, and hence they had no control over them. They did not make the deposits themselves of their own volition; the money was under the control of the treasurer, who was an agent of the Government.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further debate, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of this bill, and pass it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 12.

So (more than two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the motion was agreed to and the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask whether a second is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, the 20th day of April, 1886, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, except Mondays and Fridays—not to interfere with the consideration of revenue bills or regular appropriation bills, nor with the morning hour, nor with the hour for the call of committees for the consideration of bills, nor with prior orders—be set apart for the consideration of House bill No. 6664, entitled "A bill to increase the naval establishment;" and, if said bill shall not have been previously disposed of, that Tuesday, the 27th day of April, 1886, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the exclusive consideration thereof in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, and that the previous question on said bill and all amendments which may be offered thereto be considered as ordered at half past 5 o'clock p. m. of said 27th day of April.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second. I trust that this resolution will not pass.

The SPEAKER. A second is demanded. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] to act as tellers.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I will modify the resolution.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, what is the title of the bill to which this resolution refers?

The SPEAKER. The resolution refers to the bill for the increase of the naval establishment.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. Was not a second demanded?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] proposes to modify the resolution. As soon as that is done, it will be read as modified.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COBB. I desire to inquire whether or not this resolution, if adopted as read, would not interfere with the right of way of the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. It would, unless the modification provides otherwise. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] has modified the resolution, but the Chair has not heard it read as modified. The Clerk will now report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 22d day of April, 1886, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, except Mondays and Fridays, not to interfere with the consideration of revenue bills, regular appropriation bills, nor with the morning hour, nor with the hour for the call of committees for the consideration of bills nor with prior orders, nor with reports from the Committee on the Public Lands, be set apart for the consideration of House bill 6664, entitled "A bill to increase the naval establishment;" and if said bill shall not have been previously disposed of, that Tuesday, the 27th day of April, 1886, immediately after the reading of the Journal, is set apart for the exclusive consideration thereof in the House, as in the Committee of the Whole, and that the previous question on said bill and all amendments which may be offered thereto be considered as ordered at half past 5 o'clock p. m. of said 27th day of April.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Is the river and harbor bill a "regular appropriation bill?"

The SPEAKER. No such thing is known to the rules of the House as a "regular appropriation bill." The Chair supposes that by the term "regular appropriation bills" the gentleman means general appropriation bills. The river and harbor bill is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then under this resolution the bill to increase the naval establishment will have preference over the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir.

Mr. DUNHAM. According to the ruling of the Speaker it will.

Mr. HERBERT. I meant to except the river and harbor bill; and if there is any doubt as to the construction of the resolution I will ask to modify it in that particular.

Mr. COBB. I demand to have the resolution so modified as to give the Committee on Public Lands the right to have their bills considered.

The SPEAKER. Upon a rereading of the resolution the Chair thinks it would not interfere with the consideration of reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COBB. Will the resolution as it now stands prevent the Committee on Public Lands from taking up in the House any bill already reported by them?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the resolution as now modified will not interfere with the consideration of any such bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered on the motion to suspend the rules, so as to give me an opportunity to explain the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Has the river and harbor bill been excepted?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] that a second be considered as ordered?

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the question upon ordering a second will be taken by tellers, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. I want a chance to explain the resolution. It appears to be misunderstood. The House will not vote down the resolution if it understands it.

The tellers proceeded to make the count.

Mr. HERBERT (during the count). I ask that the resolution may be read again. It is not understood. It offers the fullest and fairest opportunity for discussion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to having the resolution read again?

Several members objected.

Mr. MORRISON (when the count had continued some time). Mr. Speaker, a majority of those voting seem to be in the affirmative, and I will not contend about the matter any longer.

The SPEAKER. Is a further count insisted upon? [A pause.] No further count being demanded, a second will be considered as ordered. Under the rules, thirty minutes are now allowed for debate on this proposition. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] will be recognized as entitled to control the time in support of the proposition, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, there are several ways of opposing successfully any proposition in this House. One of the most successful is, when there are but fifteen minutes on each side for debate to confuse the House and prevent it from understanding the provisions of the proposition. I desire that the House shall understand what the resolution is upon which it is called to vote. It simply proposes to fix a day for the consideration of the bill for the increase of the naval establishment. As originally introduced it provided that the discussion on this bill should be begun on Tuesday, April 20 (to-morrow), and should go on from day to day except Friday and Monday—not to interfere with the consideration of revenue bills, regular appropriation bills (meaning general appropriation bills), nor with the morning hour, nor with the hour for the call of committees for the consideration of bills, nor with prior orders—until Tuesday, the 27th instant, a week from to-morrow.

The resolution further provides that on that day immediately, after the reading of the journal, the bill if not previously disposed of shall be called up and be entitled to consideration to the exclusion of everything else for that one day, and that the previous question be considered as called at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes that evening; thus securing on that day five hours at least of full discussion; also giving the fullest right of amendment. The provision declaring that the previous question shall be considered as ordered at that time on the bill and on all amendments, of course, shows that the right to amend is not taken away.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Might not this order result in preventing the discussion of the bill at any time except on that special day?

Mr. HERBERT. That might possibly be the case.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is it not likely to be the case?

Mr. HERBERT. I think not.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. With all the exceptions in the resolution?

Mr. HERBERT. I think not. The resolution fixes Tuesday of next week for the final disposition of the bill.

Here we are at this stage of the session, and here is this bill to provide for the common defense—a purpose which, as we read in the Constitution, was one of the prime purposes of the Union. To-day we are utterly defenseless. Our long line of coast, our cities by the sea, are absolutely at the mercy of any foreign power. Brazil could to-day successfully bombard any city on your Atlantic coast. Chili could successfully bombard San Francisco. Both parties on this floor are committed to an increase of the naval establishment. Shall we on any pretext whatever—on the pretext by one man that the day does not suit him or that the time allowed is not long enough, and on the pretext by another that it is too long—shall we manage that this bill shall fail and not have consideration here? Who is it that will oppose the consideration of this measure, and undertake to justify himself before the country, caviling and saying that the resolution does not exactly suit him? The Committee on Naval Affairs could not have drawn the resolution so as to suit everybody. The consideration of this bill at any time must of course conflict with the consideration of some bills; the resoltion has been so worded that the conflict shall be as little as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman before he takes his seat yield for a question?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes.

Mr. HAMMOND. I would like to know whether, under your resolution, you do not absorb the day already set apart for the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TUCKER. Of course it will.

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir.

Mr. HAMMOND. Which is the 24th.

Mr. HERBERT. We do not, because that is a prior order.

Mr. TUCKER. But the gentleman's resolution does not say prior order.

Mr. HERBERT. It is on the Calendar so printed and so ordered, and there can be no doubt about it.

Mr. PERKINS. You suggest that very day be set apart for debate?

Mr. HERBERT. No; the 27th is the day set apart for final debate under the resolution.

Mr. HAMMOND. Are prior orders excepted here in the resolution?

Mr. HERBERT. They are expressly.

Mr. TUCKER. I see it does say previous orders and saves the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HERBERT. It does say so.

Mr. HAMMOND. As that is a prior order upon the Calendar.

Mr. HERBERT. Certainly, and when gentlemen come to understand the resolution I am sure there can be no objection to it. Now I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HAMMOND. That will save the Committee on the Judiciary, I believe.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I object to this proposition, because if it means anything, with all the exceptions it contains, it means that on the next Tuesday, after to-morrow at a fixed hour, with or without previous debate—and debate can not be had under this resolution—the vote shall be taken. It proposes to begin on next Thursday, and then it gives precedence to the committees having appropriation bills in charge. It excepts Saturday, because there is a prior order.

Monday it excepts or leaves out; and then Tuesday, the day on which the vote is to be taken, another appropriation bill has the right of way or precedence. Notwithstanding all these exceptions, it provides on that day, whether we have had any debate or not, the previous question, without further action on the part of the House, shall stand as ordered; and we then, in that condition of preparation or advisement, will be called upon to vote on this bill to increase the naval establishment, involving many millions of money—nobody knows how many, and if anybody does know he will have no opportunity of telling us. This is in fact to be the beginning of a new navy, the inauguration of a new policy. Besides the three or four ships already authorized but not built, this is a proposition to start ten others with $6,000,000, which is to be but a beginning.

Mr. HERBERT. Let me ask if it was not at the gentleman's instance or not that it took too much time I modified the resolution and changed it from Tuesday to Friday, and having done it the gentleman now comes in here and says it does not take time enough. Did you not do that?

Mr. MORRISON. Tuesday you propose to take the time given already to an appropriation bill, which I am anxious to have disposed of. I did suggest from my seat here that ought not to be done.

Mr. HERBERT. Did you not make the objection the resolution took too much time? and now your objection is, after it has been modified in accordance with your wish, that it does not take time enough.

Mr. MORRISON. I did, and still do, object to the obstruction of or taking the time of the unfinished appropriation bill which went over to Tuesday. I object to this and to the balance of it. It means that the previous question shall be ordered on Tuesday of next week whether there is any debate or not, and we all know there can be none. If my suggestion, that Tuesday and Wednesday ought to be left to finish the unfinished appropriation bill, was acted upon it did not change the merit of this proposition nor its effect, for these two days would be so used with or without the modification made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MORRISON. All he wants. I am done. The gentleman can occupy the remainder.

Mr. HOLMAN. Only a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this measure which should take it out of the regular routine of the business of the House. There are a great many measures of the highest importance now pending before the House, and however the resolution may be regarded, the gentleman from Alabama is certainly aware it will interfere to some extent, or is likely to interfere, with other important bills pending in the House which have been perhaps unavoidably, yet unfortunately, already delayed too long. I trust no measure will be forced before us under a suspension of the rules which will give any measure priority over that class of bills.

But, referring to the particular measure pending, I trust the House will not overlook the fact we have four ships of war already in process of construction, and four others authorized by law and not yet under contract for their construction, while this bill provides for the construction of ten more vessels of war before any steps have been taken for the construction of the four already authorized. In addition to all this, the bill provides $3,000,000 for the completion and armament of the four ironclads commenced years ago. The bill, then, without reference to its future operations, involves a direct appropriation of $6,400,000 of money.

And yet clearly the only appeal which has been or can be made for this haste and for giving this measure this advantage over other important and pressing measures—more important and more pressing—is the supposed defenseless condition of our country. It was never in as perfect a condition of defense as it is now, and every day that passes only strengthens the defense of our country against any possible assault. There is no alarm in the country. We do not represent a timid people. Congress has not represented a people apprehensive of coming danger at any time through all the century.

Such a bill as that named in the resolution I trust will not be voted into a position of undue advantage, thus postponing measures of high moment to the American people upon such an argument. I hope the House will not postpone the consideration of measures of special benefit to our industries and permanent safety in behalf of a measure of doubtful expediency, for we are entering a new field of naval construction. None of our new ships are completed; we have no such satisfactory experience in the construction of steel war-vessels by testing those already authorized as will enable us to proceed with safety in this new field of naval architecture. I agree that with reasonable rapidity the present wooden vessels of our Navy should be superseded and vessels in harmony with the naval architecture of the period should take their place. The occasion for haste in increasing our Navy is less now than at many periods in former years. We never had less occasion for haste than now, and the occasion for it is disappearing with every succeeding day. There is now certainly no occasion for it. We are in the midst of no peril.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman agree to fix any day? If he will fix any particular day for the consideration of the bill I will consent to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing that this bill shall come up in its regular order and have all the privileges to which bills of its character are entitled; but it is entitled to no priority over more important measures of the House. Bills of the highest moment to the American people are pending and should not be jostled out of the way or imperiled by a bill of no pressing importance.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that this is not a bill of the highest moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hold that it is not. If it be a matter of such vital importance, as gentlemen would seem to indicate now, I would ask how it happens that four war vessels, authorized long since, have not been even commenced or any steps taken toward their construction?

Mr. BOUTELLE. They are provided for in this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. By former law. But I repeat, all this time since that act was passed even the initial steps have not been taken for their construction, and yet the very same condition of affairs to which gentlemen refer has existed. In fact, there is less need for them now than ever. We can, as all men know, construct them at our leisure.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If the initial steps have not been taken let us make a beginning now.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it was so important, why have they not been commenced? Why have not some steps been taken, some beginning looking to their construction?

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is a question to be answered by another department of the Government over which we have no control.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is very true; but has the gentleman heard of any public complaint or clamor, any public demand for their construction, any great apprehension expressed by our people which would demand the immediate construction of new war vessels? Does he hear any expression of fear uttered by the people because of our defenseless condition? Our defenses are already complete against any peril from abroad.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think there has been a great deal of that apprehension and a great deal of uneasiness, and especially because of our condition in regard to the fisheries.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no such information. I have heard no real expressions of anxiety on the part of the people. I have not heard their voices raised for an increase of our Navy as a measure of pressing moment. Our people do not seem at all alarmed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is the gentleman from Indiana opposed to the passage of any bill at all, or is it to this particular bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am opposed, by the adoption of a resolution like this, to give precedence to a measure which is of less public consequence than many bills which would be to a greater or less degree postponed—bills of the greatest interest to our people, which are now pending.

I insist, therefore, that no step be taken by the House which will hamper or interfere with that series of bills now pending which are in my opinion the most important measures before Congress and demand consideration at the earliest moment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What bills do you refer to?

Mr. HOLMAN. I refer to bills relating to the public lands.

Mr. HERBERT. They are expressly excepted by this resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly they are, and by the terms of the resolution; but it is easily seen that the tendency of the pending resolution and proposed special order is to jostle them out of the way.

Mr. HEWITT. But the question of consideration could be raised. The House can reach them any time it may desire to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly the question of consideration can be raised, but to-day one-third of the House can defeat the passage of this resolution and the proposed special order; whereas if it passes it will require a majority of the House to proceed to the consideration of the public-land bills, to which I have referred, as against this special order if it is made.

Mr. HERBERT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it has developed itself very clearly in this debate that I was correct when I said the opposition to this resolution was captious; that it was not to the day fixed or to the length of time proposed for the discussion of the measure, but that it was to the bill itself. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] admitted on the floor of the House, when I asked the question if I had not modified and changed that resolution from Tuesday to begin on Thursday thereafter, thus giving up at his request two days, because he said the time was too long, that I was right and that he had made the objection on that ground. And yet in the face of that admission he now begins his argument against the passage of the resolution by saying that the time to be occupied in the discussion is too short!

Mr. REED, of Maine. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to admit that this resolution may result in coming to a vote on such an important bill as that to which it refers without any discussion at all?

Mr. HERBERT. No; I do not admit that.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What debate is it expected will be given?

Mr. HERBERT. Beyond all doubt five hours on Tuesday, the 27th.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Five hours. What time is the previous question to be regarded as ordered?

Mr. HERBERT. At 5.30 o'clock on that day.

Mr. REED, of Maine. We never get five hours on any day for the consideration of business in this House under such a resolution.

Mr. HERBERT. The resolution provides that on that day its consideration shall begin immediately after the reading of the Journal, and is to be taken up to the exclusion of everything else.

Mr. REED, of Maine. An appropriation bill may crowd it out of the way then.

Mr. HERBERT. No; I will read that part of the resolution:

> And if said bill shall not have been finally disposed of, that Tuesday, the 27th day of April, 1886, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the exclusive consideration thereof in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, and that the previous question on said bill, and all amendments which may be offered thereto, be considered as ordered at 5.30 p. m. on said 27th day of April.

Now, not only is that whole day, until half past 5 o'clock, secured for the discussion of this bill, but we shall have more time than that if a majority of the House wants it.

If when it comes up on Thursday there is a question of consideration between this and any other bill—if this House believes, as I am sure a majority of it does believe, that this is an important measure which ought to be considered and passed, all we have to do when Thursday comes, if we want to discuss it on that day, is to take it up and debate it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But under this resolution we have no debate under the five-minute rule, which is the most valuable debate there is. We get no consideration of particular measures.

Mr. HERBERT. We do.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The gentleman from Alabama knows as well as anybody else that in the consideration of a bill like this in the House the best debate is the five-minute debate, because otherwise there is no consideration of particular points.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not know any reason why when you consider a bill as in Committee of the Whole you can not discuss any particular feature of it just as well as you can do in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It can not be done except under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HERBERT. The real question is, Do we want to pass any bill of this kind this session? I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. I can only say I want a navy; and I am willing to get that navy, whether by a long or a short debate. I feel our Government is the only great government in the world that has no adequate protection, and it is our bounden duty to provide an adequate navy to defend our country in the event of war. Debate may be all very well and I am in favor of debate; I should be glad if abundant opportunity should be given for debate on this important subject. But I want the Navy, whether we have long debate or short debate. But I presume the Committee on Naval Affairs has given this matter very full and fair consideration, and have reported a bill which will meet the approval of the House and the country. Therefore I hope this proposition to fix a day, and thus secure some tangible result in this direction, will be adopted.

Mr. HERBERT. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HERBERT. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, I think it is to be regretted that this measure, which is of very considerable consequence on its merits, should have got involved in a discussion as to whether under the resolution there will be time enough for the consideration of the bill, because if it should turn out when the final day named arrives that the bill has not received proper consideration, I think it would be the disposition of the committee and the House then to enlarge the time. But now for this House to refuse to fix a day upon the request of one of the most important committees of the House, that has given very careful consideration to a measure commended to it by the President of the United States, and which has been recognized in the platform of both political parties as a burning question to be disposed of, the question, namely, of the creation of a navy—to refuse to fix a day to take up the subject on the ground that there is not sufficient time when my friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] knows he can readily arrange for an extension of the time if it be desired, it seems to me would be trifling with a very grave and important question.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is mistaken when he says this country is in a state of defense. Three reports are now in print before this House—one from the Senate committee on defense, one from the fortifications board, and one from the committee of this House—on the subject of national defense, all recognizing the fact that the country is lamentably deficient in the means of defense. It is the great embarrassment to-day in our negotiations with foreign nations whether we can take our stand firmly on any great international question demanded by the dignity, the interests, and the welfare of this country.

The Naval Committee ask to be heard upon this question. They ask to be heard in the fulfillment of a solemn pledge given by both the great parties represented in this House. They ask it in response to the recommendation of the President. And I should say but little reliance could be placed upon the patriotism and upon the wisdom of this House if this demand to discuss and consider a measure of great national importance should be refused. If it be granted, and the proposition of the committee be not acceptable, then let it be voted down, but at least give it a hearing.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is the House that wants a hearing on this subject as well as the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to know whether under the terms of this order by which on Tuesday the bill is to be considered as in Committee of the Whole, whether on that day there will be a debate under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. That will depend entirely on the action of the House. General debate can go on until the House stops it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If we can have the five-minute debate on Tuesday with the right of amendment, that is one thing; but if we are merely to hear from the committee, that is not enough.

Mr. HERBERT. I will do all in my power to extend the time, and the majority of the House can extend it. I will do everything I can.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt this resolution, there were—ayes 69, noes 7.

Mr. BAYNE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The affirmative having been counted, there were ayes 35—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Count the other side.

The negative vote being taken, there were noes 116.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 102, not voting 100; as follows:

Mr. RICHARDSON. My colleague, Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR, is detained at home by reason of sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

IMMEDIATE POSTAL-DELIVERY SYSTEM.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to move to suspend the rules, and take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 4865) to extend the system for the immediate delivery of letters and pass the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objections. The Chair understands that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is to pass the bill as an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to extend the system for the immediate delivery of letters, and amendatory of sections 3, 4, and 5 of the act approved March 3, 1885, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That every article of mailable matter upon which the special stamp provided for by section 3 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," shall be duly affixed, shall be entitled to immediate delivery, according to said act, within the carrier-delivery limit of any free-delivery office and within one mile of any other post-office which the Postmaster-General shall at any time designate as a special-delivery post-office. The postmaster shall be responsible for such immediate delivery of every such article, and shall cause delivery to be made of all such articles received at his office bearing such stamp and entitled to delivery thereat; and may employ any persons, including clerks and assistants, at third and fourth class offices, as messengers, on such terms as he shall fix as compensation for such delivery; and to defray the expense thereof such postmaster shall be entitled, upon the adjustment of his quarterly account, to 80 per cent. of the face value of all such special-delivery stamps received at his office and recorded, according to said act and regulations of the Post-Office Department, during the quarter; and such allowances shall be in full of all the expenses of such delivery: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, direct any free-delivery office to be excepted from the foregoing provision, and require the delivery to be made entirely by special messengers, according to the provisions of the act to which this is amendatory: And provided further, That he may contract for the immediate delivery of all articles from any post-office at any price less than 8 cents per piece when he shall deem it expedient.

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster-General shall prescribe suitable regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the performance of the immediate-delivery service, the keeping of the records and rendering of accounts thereof, and all matters connected therewith, and may prescribe the hours within which such immediate delivery shall be made at any post-office.

SEC. 3. That any postmaster, or any assistant postmaster, clerk, or employé of a postmaster, who shall make any false return or record of the receipt or delivery of any article of mailable matter as being stamped with a special-delivery stamp, or shall make any false return of the number of articles specially delivered from his office, for the purpose of increasing his compensation under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, or imprisoned for a term of not less that thirty days nor more than one year, or both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court; and whenever, upon evidence deemed satisfactory to him, the Postmaster-General shall determine that any such false return has been made, he may, by order, fix absolutely the compensation of the postmaster for such special delivery during any quarter or quarters which he shall deem affected by such false return, and the Auditor shall adjust the postmaster's account accordingly.

SEC. 4. That any person employed to make immediate delivery of letters or other mail matter under the provisions of this act, or the act of which the same is amendatory, shall be deemed an employé of the postal service, whether he may have been sworn or not, or temporarily or permanently employed, and as such employé shall be liable to any penalties or punishments provided by law for the improper detention, delay, secretion, rifling, embezzlement, purloining, or destruction of any letter or other article of mail matter, or the contents thereof, intrusted to him for delivery or placed in his custody.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? If not, the question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the special-delivery system was authorized by the act of March 3, 1885, sections 3, 4, 5, and 6, which are in the following words:

SEC. 3. That a special stamp of the face valuation of 10 cents may be provided and issued, whenever deemed advisable or expedient, in such form and bearing such device as may meet the approval of the Postmaster-General, which, when attached to a letter, in addition to the lawful postage thereon, the delivery of which is to be at a free-delivery office, or at any city, town, or village containing a population of 4,000 or over, according to the Federal census, shall be regarded as entitling such letter to immediate delivery within the carrier limit of any free-delivery office which may be designated by the Postmaster-General as a special-delivery office, or within 1 mile of the post-office at any other office coming within the provisions of this section which may in like manner be designated as a special-delivery office.

SEC. 4. That such specially stamped letters shall be delivered from 7 o'clock ante meridian up to 12 o'clock midnight at offices designated by the Postmaster-General under section 3 of this act.

SEC. 5. That to provide for the immediate delivery of letters bearing the special stamp, the postmaster at any office which may come within the provisions of this act may, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, employ such person or persons as may actually be required for such service, who, upon the delivery of such letter, will procure a receipt from the party addressed, or some one authorized to receive it, in a book to be furnished for the purpose, which shall, when not in use, be kept in the post-office and at all times subject to examination by an inspector of the Department.

SEC. 6. That to provide for the payment of such persons as may be employed for this service, the postmaster at any office designated by section 3 of this act shall keep a record of the number of letters received at such office bearing such special stamp, which number shall correspond with the number entered in the receipt-books heretofore specified; and at the end of each month he may pay to such person or persons employed a sum not exceeding 80 per cent. of the face value of all such stamps received and recorded during that month: Provided, That in no case shall the compensation so paid to any one person exceed $30 per month: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall in any way interfere with the prompt delivery of letters as now provided by law or regulation of the Post-Office Department.

The amendatory act is a proposition to enlarge the usefulness of the special-delivery system by adding to the public convenience and at the same time profiting the revenues of the Postal Department.

A few days since I submitted a report upon this measure which fully sets forth the reasons that induced the committee to recommend its passage; and I shall give in substance the body of that report, so that the House may be fully advised.

Mr. Speaker, the special-delivery system was put into operation under appropriate regulations by the Postmaster-General on the 1st of October, 1885, at all the post-offices to which the law authorized him to extend it, namely, those at places having a population of 4,000 and over, and embracing 555 in number. From the annual report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885 (pages 32–35), and from the further experience gained since that report was submitted, it appears that the special-delivery system has proved to be a most useful adjunct to the postal service; but at the same time certain defects in the system as at present organized have manifested themselves.

RESTRICTIONS.

Under the third section of the act of March 3, above quoted, the privilege of immediate delivery is restricted to "letters," or, as construed, to mail matter of the first class. There would appear to be no good reason in principle or policy for this limitation. If it be right to transmit by mail at all a newspaper, book, or packet of merchandise, it is difficult to see why such article should be denied any of the special facilities afforded by the mails, the more particularly when the fee charged for the special service is in excess of the cost of doing the work. There would be as much reason for confining the registry system to letters; but so popular has the registration of third and fourth class matter become, that the fees from that source amounted to $98,330.30 during the last fiscal year. No practical difficulties exist in the way of extending the special-delivery system to all articles of mail matter; indeed, the delivery of parcels by special messenger is not open to the objection that might be urged against their delivery by regular carrier at the free-delivery offices, that of a liability to hinder the delivery of letters and to overload a carrier on a trip.

The committee, therefore, unhesitatingly recommend that the privileges of immediate delivery be extended to embrace all classes of mail matter, believing that thereby the utility of the system would be greatly enhanced and the postal revenue correspondingly benefited. The proposed step would go far to justify a still more important enlargement of the system, the extension of the privileges of special delivery, within the discretion of the Postmaster-General, to all the post-offices in the country. Though letters bearing special-delivery stamps may be mailed at any post-office, they may be specially delivered only when addressed to one of the limited number of places embraced within the present list of special-delivery offices. At the great mass of the offices the people are denied a facility in the receipt of mail matter that they are given in dispatching it; and it so happens that the people from whom the privilege of immediate delivery is withheld are those who would be likely to appreciate it the most highly.

At the large offices where the free-delivery system is in use the difference in time between delivery by regular carrier and by special messenger is at most a question of a few hours only, while at the smaller towns and in the country where mail matter must be called for, it might lie undelivered for days or even weeks. The certainty of prompt delivery at such places, in cases of urgency, would undoubtedly contribute greatly to the use of the mails. Under the present working of the system the uncertainty as to what post-offices are special-delivery offices, and the necessity of consulting a list, which may not be conveniently at hand, doubtless operates to prevent the use of special-delivery stamps in many cases in which the system would be patronized if it were known to prevail at all post-offices.

I am fully convinced that the chief value of the special-delivery system depends upon its general application, and the committee urgently recommend that authority be given to the Postmaster-General to extend the privilege of immediate delivery to all post-offices.

FEES FOR THE SERVICE.

It is not believed that any serious obstacles will occur to prevent the execution of the system under its proposed extension. It will be necessary, however, to modify existing legislation with regard to the method of applying the fees allowed for special-delivery service. The amount of business at other than the principal offices would not of course justify the employment of messengers whose time was required exclusively in connection with that service. If, however, the postmaster is given the commissions authorized by law and held resposible for the work, he will doubtless be able to secure its performance with reasonable promptness and safety. He might do the work himself or intrust it to his clerk or other reputable person who may be conveniently at hand, under such restrictions as may be imposed by the Postmaster-General. In many of the third and fourth class offices the time of the clerks is only partially occupied, and in their intervals of leisure they would gladly perform special-messenger service, if, in addition to their regular compensation, they could be paid the commissions allowed the messengers for the work.

At the largest post-offices there has been so far no difficulty in providing suitable messengers in sufficient force to do the required work with reasonable promptness and efficiency, but at many of the smaller of the present special-delivery offices, constituting probably a majority of the whole number, the business has not been found sufficient to maintain messengers in regular employment. Under the law neither a postmaster at such an office, nor any of his clerks, can be paid anything additional on account of special-delivery service; so that where a regular messenger can not be procured, there is either a failure to make prompt delivery of letters arriving at the office or there is a hardship imposed upon the employé who is called upon to perform that service. It is evident that unless the proposed change be made in the method of compensating for the service it will be necessary to abandon the system at all other than the large offices, where the amount of business transacted will justify the employment of a regular messenger force, and hence the provision for granting the fees to the postmaster and making him responsible for conducting the work, and allowing postmasters of the third and fourth classes to use their clerks for this service.

FREE-DELIVERY OFFICES.

The free-delivery offices are in the discretion of the Postmaster-General excepted from the operations of the proviso allowing postmasters 80 per cent. of the face value of the special-delivery stamps received and recorded at their offices, because the committee believe that the Postmaster-General should have the authority to make contracts with individuals or with companies properly organized for the work, and under appropriate safeguards and regulations to have all special-delivery matter arriving at said offices immediately delivered at any price less than 8 cents per piece—the price allowed by law to the messengers—if he shall deem such contracts expedient.

The committee think, from propositions which they are informed have been made to the Post-Office Department for the performance of this service by local telegraph or messenger companies in several of the larger cities, that there will be no difficulty in making contracts for the service in question which will secure quite as reliable service as the Department could otherwise provide, and at considerably less cost.

HOURS FOR CLOSING.

A defect in the present system, which is the occasion of unnecessary hardship, and which is sought to be remedied by section 2 of the bill, is the requirement to make immediate delivery at all special-delivery offices up to midnight of each day. As the law is construed to comprehend the immediate delivery of local letters as well as letters arriving from other post-offices, the special-delivery offices are required to be kept open until the hour named, and in many cases long after the arrival of the last mail, upon the chance that a local letter may be deposited for immediate delivery. Reports received at the Post-Office Department from postmasters show that the number of local special-delivery letters deposited after the close of business hours at most of the special-delivery offices is very trifling; so that, without any serious inconvenience to the public, the privilege of immediate delivery at a majority of the offices might be restricted to business hours, or, say, from 7 a. m. to the time when the last mail arrives before midnight. As the time of arrival of such mail varies at different offices, the establishment of the hours of delivery could properly be prescribed by the Postmaster-General.

With the modifications suggested, the committee believe that a wide field of usefulness will be opened up for the special-delivery system, and therefore recommend the passage of the amendatory act.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I will briefly summarize the changes as proposed in the pending bill.

The present law requires all special-delivery offices to be kept open until midnight; this bill proposes to repeal that law and leave the matter to departmental regulations.

The present law prohibits the employment of clerks for this service at all post-offices; this bill allows the postmasters at third and fourth class offices to use their clerks and assistants.

The present law allows all messengers 8 cents on each package received and delivered; this bill makes the postmasters responsible for the delivery of packages bearing special stamps and allows them 80 per cent. of their face value; it further authorizes the Postmaster-General to contract with individuals or companies for the service in large cities, if in his discretion he deems it advisable, for a less sum than 80 per cent. of their face value.

The present law restricts the service to all free-delivery offices and cities having a population of 4,000 or over; this bill extends its benefits to all post-offices in the United States, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

The present law restricts the privilege of the service to letters, or, as construed, to mail matter of the first class; this bill extends the benefits of the service to all classes of mail matter.

The amendatory act has the hearty support of the Postmaster-General and his Third Assistant, and I may also add, the approval of every member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The bill not only provides for this service without cost to the Government, but under its provisions 20 per cent. of the gross receipts go into the Treasury as a net profit to assist in defraying the expenses of the Post-office Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken, and more than two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, some members of the committee desire to submit remarks upon this bill, and on their behalf I ask that they may have leave to do so.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHEROKEE RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to move to suspend the rules and take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 138) to provide for the sale of the Cherokee reservation in the State of Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for a second.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the lands known as the old Cherokee reservation, in townships 7 and 8 north, of range 21 west of the fifth principal meridian, in the State of Arkansas, be, and are hereby, placed under the control of the General Land Office, to be sold and disposed of in the same manner and under the same regulations as other public lands of the United States, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That such homestead and pre-emption entries as have been made, under instructions from the General Land Office, upon the odd-numbered sections of said reservation, as shall appear to be in all respects fair and regular, except as to time of sale, are hereby confirmed, and patents shall be issued thereon as in other cases.

SEC. 3. That all actual settlers, and settlers upon adjoining lands, who are duly qualified to make entries under the homestead laws of the United States, and who settled upon or improved either odd or even numbered sections of said reservation at any time prior to the date of this act, and are now residing thereon, or cultivating the same and residing upon adjoining lands, shall be entitled to a preference right of entry under said laws, not to exceed 160 acres, including the tract on which they reside, if residing on adjoining lands, with credit for actual settlement and residence or cultivation heretofore made in computing the time necessary to perfect title; but in no case shall actual settlers on adjoining lands be permitted to abandon any part of their claims upon which settlements have been made to secure a larger or increased amount of the reservation: Provided, That all such parties shall file their applications under the homestead laws within three months from date of receipt by the local land officers of instructions under this act from the Commissioner of the General Land Office and make proof and payment as in other cases.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? If not, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 103) making an appropriation for the purchase of ground and the erection thereon in the city of Washington of a building to be used as a hall of records; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WELLBORN. By instruction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 27th day of May, and Saturday, the 29th day of May, after the morning hour, for the consideration of bills reported from committees, be set apart for such business as may be presented or indicated by the Committee on Indian Affairs; this order not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills, or prior orders of the House, or bills reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection a second will be considered as ordered on the motion to suspend the rules. The Chair hears no objection. Under the rules thirty minutes are now allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in favor of and fifteen minutes against the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] indicate the character of the bills which the committee propose to bring forward.

Mr. WELLBORN. There have been reported to the House by this committee three classes of measures, which to my mind are matters not of local interest but of general concern. First, there is a bill providing for the allotment of Indian lands in severalty. In the next place, there has been reported to the House a bill providing for opening a part of the Great Sioux reservation in Dakota. In the third place, there are a number of bills—one general bill and some of a special character—granting rights of way under certain circumstances across the Indian Territory. While of course I have no authority to indicate what measures the Committee on Indian Affairs will call up, I state my own personal judgment when I say that the measures I have enumerated, and probably in the order in which they have been stated, will be presented for the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. If no further debate be desired, the question will be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. HILL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Territories to move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, May 1, and Saturday, May 8, 1886, be set apart, after the morning hour, for the consideration of such business as may be reported and called up by the Committee on the Territories, not to interfere with general appropriation bills, revenue bills, or bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands; but this order shall be continued from day to day until two days have been occupied.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose under this resolution it is intended to bring up bills now on the Calendar. Does the resolution so state?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution again.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have that resolution amended or modified so as to confine it to reports now on the Calendar from the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not subject to amendment; but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] has the right to modify it.

Mr. BLAND. Under this resolution will the bills for the admission of Dakota and Washington Territories into the Union be called up?

Mr. HILL. If it be in order, I will state for the information of the House——

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection a second will be considered as ordered. The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] is now entitled to fifteen minutes; and fifteen minutes, if desired, will be allowed in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, there are on the Calendar a number of bills from the Committee on the Territories. They are all of a local nature, except one, which provides for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma; and from the character of that bill I am satisfied that it and the bills already on the Calendar will require far more time than the committee ask for in this resolution. I propose hereafter to ask for further time for other business to be reported from the Committee on Territories, but I do not make that request now.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he modify the resolution so as to include merely what it really means according to the statement he has just made.

A MEMBER (to Mr. HILL). Insert the words "heretofore reported."

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to that, except that there are two or three bills of a local and non-partisan character which we hope to report next week—bills which do not concern the admission of any Territory into the Union as a State; and I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania would have no objection to the consideration of those bills if he knew what they are.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to any bill in particular; I object to the loose manner in which the resolution is worded. If the gentleman will modify it so as to include only bills now on the Calendar, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the House that the Committee on the Territories, having jurisdiction of legislation pertaining to eight Territories of the Union, legislation in which perhaps as many as two million people are interested, has not yet had an opportunity to present more than one bill for the consideration of this House—the bill which related to the annexation of the Pan Handle of Idaho to the Territory of Washington. There are many questions of interest to the people of the Territories which ought to receive at once the attention of Congress. The fact that we have so long neglected these great interests of our Territories is certainly to be regretted, and further delay ought not to be tolerated if it can be avoided. We ask, therefore, that some time be set apart when this House can give due consideration to these vast interests; and I assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the bill to which he refers perhaps will not be called up under this particular order. There are enough bills ahead of it to occupy the whole time which this resolution proposes to give us.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not referred to any particular bill.

Mr. RYAN. I desire to ask this question——

Mr. SPRINGER. I know he did not mention any.

Mr. RYAN. What bills do you refer to as those you will not call up?

Mr. HILL. I refer to the bill for the admission of Dakota as a State into the Union, as that bill has not been considered in committee with a view to final action. We are still considering it, and we will not be able to report the measure in time to have that bill considered under this order. We have business ready from that committee—more than enough to consume all the time allowed under this order.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does this embrace Oklahoma?

Mr. HILL. It does; and the chief desire is to reach that important question.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been modified to the 1st and 8th of May, covering those two Saturdays after the morning hour.

Mr. HILL. If we properly consider Oklahoma and other bills on the Calendar there will be no time for anything else.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be confined to that, then.

Mr. HILL. I am perfectly willing to confine it to those bills, unless by unanimous consent there should be some request made as to matters of detail about which there would be no objection.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let the order so read.

Mr. HILL. Rather than have the resolution fail, I agree to the amendments which have been suggested.

Mr. RANDALL. It is to embrace only those bills now upon the Calendar to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. MORRISON. That is the understanding; only those bills now on the Calendar.

Mr. HILL. And also those which may be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Unanimous consent can take care of itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right, then.

Mr. BURROWS. Why does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist upon the restriction?

Mr. RANDALL. Because I wish to be aware now of the legislation which the committee mean to present under the suspension of the rules for the consideration of the House. I am always candid and frank. The gentleman from Michigan knows how I stand as to Dakota, because he and I contended over that a good many years ago.

Mr. BURROWS. I think I remember it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the modification?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes; I object to the modification.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HILL. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will withdraw his objection. He will simply delay the consideration of the Dakota question by delaying the consideration of all this other business. These bills have to be disposed of, and they ought to be disposed of at once.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman say there is no probability a bill for the admission of Dakota will be reported at that time and be ready for action?

Mr. HILL. I do not say so; I am not disposed to smother any bill before that committee, but if you delay the committee in the work they have already on the Calendar you necessarily delay everything else.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no disposition to delay the gentleman in considering the business of that committee so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BURROWS. I think I will withdraw my objection. I wished to find out the feeling of the House on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution as it has been modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, May 1, and Saturday, May 8, A. D., 1886, be set apart, after the morning hour, for the consideration of such business now on the Calendar as may be called up by the Committee on the Territories, not to interfere with general appropriation bills, revenue bills, or bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands; but this order shall be continued from day to day until two days have been occupied.

The rules were suspended and the resolution adopted (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

ILLINOIS AND MISSISSIPPI RIVER CANAL, ETC.

Mr. MURPHY. I am directed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to move to suspend the rules and offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, May 6, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration in the House, as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, House bill 5869, to provide for the acceptance by the United States of the proposed grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and all its appurtenances, from the State of Illinois, and for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and if said bill shall not be disposed of on that day, this shall be a continuing order until said bill is disposed of; this order not to interfere with the consideration of revenue and general appropriation bills and all prior special orders.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second demanded of the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and Mr. HOLMAN demanded a second.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and Mr. MURPHY were appointed as tellers.

Mr. MURPHY. I ask a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. HATCH, and Mr. RANDALL objected.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 111, noes 57.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule thirty minutes are allowed for debate; fifteen for and fifteen against it. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] will be recognized to control the time in support of the motion.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I desire to occupy the time of the House after the vote we have already taken, because I am satisfied there is a disposition on the part of the House to give us a fair hearing, and that is all we ask. I only ask for a brief moment while I relate a fact which all will acknowledge as soon as stated, and that is, we have sat in that Committee on Railways and Canals for the last three years and considered this matter, and this is the third time it has been reported to the House, and in addition I simply ask in all candor and fairness whether we are not entitled at least to have an opportunity to present our case, and if upon presentation it appears we have no case, then let gentlemen on this floor vote as they think proper.

But that committee, composed as it is, sitting there week after week, as it has done, and presenting unanimous reports to this House, I say is not receiving that justice to which its labor is entitled if it shall be refused even the privilege of a hearing.

Sir, I desire to call attention to the fact that there has been no improvement which has received such a general indorsement as has the construction of this canal, and the facts justify me in that statement. I do not deem it necessary to occupy any further time, and will listen to what can be said on the other side, reserving my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if the House intends to inaugurate this system of internal improvements at the national expense, it can do no better than to set down a hearing for the project known as the Hennepin Canal. I have objected to the consideration of this measure because I believe it ought not to pass, and not because I have the slightest objection to the fullest, freest possible consideration of the project.

But this House does not need to be informed in that regard; we have heard it frequently during the last three or four sessions——

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. All of the necessities of the case have been presented in the most elaborate speeches by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] and others. I apprehend that there is not one provision even of the minutest detail with which the members of this House are not fully informed, at least those of them who feel any interest whatever in the matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the summer is fast coming on, and business of importance is on our Calendars which ought to be taken up and considered before the final adjournment. I am, therefore, opposed to wasting the time of the House in the consideration of a measure that cannot by any possibility pass; a measure that inaugurates a system that would lead to the most prodigal extravagance, the inauguration of a class of legislation that is in the face of the Constitution, if the Constitution means anything. I have sometimes doubted, indeed, whether it had any meaning that could be interposed between legislation and the national Treasury. Whenever we want money, it seems as if we can find some provision of the Constitution under which it may be taken.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will, with pleasure. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HATCH. Only a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the provision of this resolution, providing this bill, now in Committee of the Whole, and which I regard as the most important measure in many respects to come before this Congress, shall be taken out of the Committee of the Whole and considered in the House, where the friends of the measure can demand the previous question upon it at any stage of its discussion. Three several times within the last ten days the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] has attempted by unanimous consent to get this resolution through the House taking this bill out of the Committee of the Whole and to have it considered in the House, where the previous question will cut off all discussion. And what is it?

The bill is a new departure for this Congress, inaugurating as it does a system of internal improvement which, in my judgment, in its ultimate consequences will involve an expenditure of $100,000,000, and with no more merit than is possessed by a dozen or so different canal bills that will be pressed upon us and upon future Congresses if this passes. The whole object of this resolution is clear. It is not the consideration of the Hennepin Canal bill, but the object is that bill shall be taken out of the Committee of the Whole, brought into the House, and passed under the previous question. If two-thirds of the members on this floor are to-day willing to relinquish their rights and the rights of their people in that regard they will do so with full knowledge of the facts before them. If we pass this resolution it is the last fair consideration of that bill. It is simply a gag. We will tie our hands and enslave this Congress, so far as it can be done, by passing a bill like this under the whip and spur of the previous question.

I say to you, gentlemen, just as earnestly as I have ever opposed any proposition in this House in my life, that I believe this is the most dangerous bill introduced into any of the four Congresses in which I have had the honor to sit upon this floor. Are you simply going to pass the Hennepin Canal bill? Is there only one canal project in the United States that has merit in it? Will you refuse to connect the waters of the Ohio and the mouth of the Savannah River? Will you refuse an appropriation to the Delaware and Lackawanna Canal? Will you decline to appropriate money to build scores of canals and pass scores of bills that have been pending before Congress for the last twenty-five years?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee Mr. [MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. I shall only occupy a portion of the time, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of saying that I heartily concur in what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] has said concerning the effect of the passage of the resolution on the future consideration of the bill, and in what both gentlemen who have spoken have said as to its effect on future legislation and the country.

What is the condition of the Treasury and of the country to-day? There are a number of your harbors all around this country that can not be entered because of the sands that have washed into them from the rivers of the continent. The amount that could be appropriated for river and harbor and canal purposes is limited, and hence if you increase the number of canals that are to share in this appropriation you to that extent destroy the legitimate work and the necessary work of cleaning out the harbors by which the country is approached. Are gentlemen ready to do it?

We have all seen the different appropriation bills for the purpose of constructing water ways come before Congress, and we have seen one Congress die, and the party which went out a majority return a minority as much because of appropriating $18,000,000 for that purpose as anything else. I am in favor of legitimate river and harbor improvements. I have favored them all along the line. I oppose this because I do not believe it is wise policy to abandon the channels that the Great Architect of the universe made and go out to make channels that He did not see fit to make for commerce.

I concur in what the gentleman from Missouri has said concerning what will be the result upon this House. You tie your hands, and whenever a majority of the House sees fit to gag the balance it can do it under the resolution. If this new policy of appropriations is to be entered upon, if this new method of expending the public money, this new method of getting into the Treasury, this new method of laying the foundation of new taxes is to be entered upon, why not do it as is required in the case of other bills? Why not approach this object under the rules of the House? Why not consider this bill in the House in place of in Committee of the Whole?

I do not believe this proposition is wise. Whatever the future may require we may trust confidently that future generations will be able to give. But to-day the necessities for this measure in our present tax-ridden condition are not sufficient to justify the Representatives of the people in entering upon a system of appropriations that are not limited by the Hennepin Canal, that are not limited by five millions, that are not limited by ten millions, nor by twenty millions, nor even by fifty millions, but that means the construction of canals all over the country to be controlled by the Government and to demand new officers and new appropriations annually.

I oppose the resolution fixing a day for consideration because I do not believe the bill ought to be passed. I believe there are other more important measures before this Congress. There are over a hundred million of acres of public land that ought to be reclaimed for the people. Shall we set aside that work, that can only be done now, and that must be done soon if ever done, and go into one of most doubtful expediency? For one I protest we should not. I yield what time is left to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. I only desire to say that this bill has had its usual two hours under the rule and has gone to the Calendar. It is the second bill on that Calendar. The first bill on the Calendar is one to pay a debt long due to the State of Georgia, and which has had the unanimous report of two if not more Judiciary Committees of the House of Representatives. I am not willing, if I had no other objection to this bill, to give it the precedence over that one. I think its friends should let it stay on the Calendar and help me to get up the Georgia case and dispose of it first. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

Mr. TUCKER. I shall oppose the proposition to consider this bill, because I am irreconcilably opposed to its passage. If this bill passes it will open a new chapter in the history of appropriations in this House for this class of expenditures.

The Constitution as it was adopted was proposed to be amended in the Federal convention by giving the express power to dig canals where considered necessary. That power was expressly forbidden by a vote of three States in its favor and seven in opposition.

This Hennepin Canal is not only not an improvement between States, but it is an improvement exclusively within one State. If you have a right to dig a canal in Illinois, you have a right to dig a canal in another State which does not go beyond the boundaries of the State; and if to dig a canal, you have the right to build a railroad. So that if this bill passes it is the opening of a new chapter of appropriations for all internal improvements inside of a State which can have what my friend from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] calls any national benefit. My doctrine is obsta principiis. I oppose the beginning of this thing.

Mr. MURPHY. How do you justify the canals already constructed by the Government?

Mr. TUCKER. The canals that have already been constructed have been in furtherance of a natural avenue of commerce between States. If the Government has done anything else it has done what I believe to be wrong, and I will not follow that precedent.

As I said the other day in reference to another matter, I hope that if there is any such precedent it will have no progeny, and this would be a progeny that would be very fruitful of future ills to this country. I shall oppose it in the beginning and in the end.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] has thirteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MURPHY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if what my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] says be correct, then I would like to know what force is to be given to the objection made by my friend from Missouri [Mr. HATCH]. The one says this question has been fully discussed, and that every detail of it is understood by the members of this House. If that be so, what is there to hinder us from coming to a vote directly on the proposition without any further discussion?

Mr. Speaker, I have not time in the ten minutes allowed me to meet the objections that have been raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], supplemented by the objections of the gentleman from Virginia and others. Ten minutes will not do for a constitutional argument, but I will make one answer to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], who says that the constitutional convention expressly refused to include in the Constitution the power to construct canals. That statement has been made before, and a gentleman as distinguished in the annals of our statesmanship as any other in our history has said that it was not well authenticated.

And the same distinguished gentleman said further that even admitting there was an attempt in the constitutional convention to include this power in the Constitution and it failed, that that was no argument against the power, because the power might have been considered as already included in the Constitution. That was the view taken by Henry Clay when a member of this House in the year, I believe, in which I was born. Mr. Speaker, every objection which we hear urged against this measure on constitutional grounds has been urged against the improvement of every river and of every harbor in the United States in days that are gone by. If you will go to President Polk's veto message of the river and harbor bill in, I think, 1848, to General Jackson's veto of the Maysville road bill, or to any other of the messages of Presidents of the United States vetoing internal-improvement bills, you will find that the same objections which are urged here as constitutional objections against this bill and bills of this class have been urged against the improvement of rivers and harbors, and if good, to be consistent, we should vote against the improvement of all rivers or harbors in the United United States; and I want to make the assertion here and now, that if there is any power in the Constitution under which Congress can improve a river or a harbor it is in my opinion under that provision of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations and the Indian tribes.

That is the provision under which we have improved the Mississippi River and all the other rivers and harbors of the country, although Mr. Calhoun, when president of the river convention at Memphis in 1845, expressed the opinion that Congress might improve the Mississippi on the ground that it was a great inland sea. But, sir, all those ideas have been exploded long since. They have been exploded by the action of Congress, and we have the very best authority for saying that the power under the Constitution is full and complete in Congress to authorize the construction of a canal, if it facilitates commerce or regulates commerce between the States and with foreign nations by facilitating it, as it is to improve a river. But the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] complains that the friends of this bill seek to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole. What is the objection to that? What is the objection to it, Mr. Speaker? We propose to consider this bill as we often in the House consider other bills, and if, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] states, we have taken up so much time in the discussion of this bill and the House so well understands it, then we ought to be permitted to come to a vote upon it and settle the question one way or the other, and that is what we ask to-day.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is what we propose to do.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Give the friends of this measure an opportunity to consider it on the floor of the House. Give us an opportunity to meet all your objections, whether constitutional or otherwise; for I think they can be successfully met. At any rate, give to the people who are interested in this great internal improvement—and I declare here that there is none greater presented for your consideration, in my opinion—give them an oportunity to be heard; give us an opportunity to present our reasons for the passage of this bill. Do not stop to consider that one hundred millions or five hundred millions may be expended in other directions. That kind of argument would defeat every bill which appropriates a dollar from the Treasury. If this bill has merit in it, let it stand or fall upon its own merits.

The argument made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] would prevent the improvement of the Mississippi River, which runs by his own city, as effectually as it would prevent the construction of this canal. I appeal to members of this House, if there is a disposition to be fair, if there is a disposition to give the people interested in this national enterprise any sort of a hearing upon this floor—I ask that you will give us an opportunity to consider this bill, and then vote as your judgment and your consciences dictate. I say to members of this House that in my opinion this is a meritorious measure. It is a measure in which more than one-tenth of the people of this entire country, as I believe, are deeply interested; it is a measure in which millions of the commerce of this country are interested. I do not care if the canal is wholly in the State of Illinois, the wheat and other products that will pass over it will go from Minnesota and from the entire Northwest to Boston and to New York, and the construction of this canal would benefit the people of Minnesota and Iowa and the people of New York and Massachusetts, and I may say of all New England, if it would benefit anybody. Illinois, where the canal would be located if constructed, would not be any more interested in or benefited by its construction than many, very many, other States.

This canal would put the people of the city of New York and of the Atlantic seaboard in direct communication by a line of water transportation with the people at the head of navigation on the Mississippi River; and if this is not an important work, in which people outside of the State of Illinois are interested, I do not know what can be such a work. All I ask is that this House shall show a disposition to be fair and just to the people of this country in the consideration of public measures, and that we shall have a fair opportunity, as well as other parts of the country interested in improvements, to be heard.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] does not stop to consider the danger of improving the Cumberland River by locks and dams. He has never stopped to consider the danger of improving the Tennessee River by the construction of a canal at a cost of four or five millions of dollars; nor has the House stopped to consider objections to other measures of this character, even when they were far less meritorious.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have said more than I intended to say, and will close by again appealing to members of the House for a fair hearing. If I have any time left I yield it to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The SPEAKER. There is one minute of the gentleman's ten minutes remaining.

Mr. NEECE. I would like to occupy two minutes.

The SPEAKER. There are four minutes remaining of the time in favor of the resolution.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, if I have any knowledge of the object of internal improvements, they are for the purpose of facilitating the commerce of the country, so that it may be carried at the cheapest possible rate. Now will any gentleman on this floor deny the proposition that all internal improvements, no matter of what kind or character, are in the interest of commerce and are made for that purpose and that alone? And will it be denied that water transportation is cheaper than transportation by rail or any other means?

We all know that this question of interstate commerce has been agitated on the floors of Congress and before the people by resolution upon resolution, the purpose of such legislation being simply to exercise some control over the charges for railroad transportation, which can only be effectually done by improving our means of water transportation, removing bars that obstruct navigation, connecting this water way with that water way, thus giving continuous water connection from the far interior to the seaboard.

When my friend from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] states with an earnestness that is characteristic of him that this work will cost $100,000,000, he simply makes an open confession that he at least, if no other member on this floor, ought to have an opportunity to give thought and consideration to this subject; for I do know that if he would take the report of the civil engineers he would find that this canal would not cost for deepening and enlarging the old channel and constructing the new more than $9,000,000, and it seems to me there is considerable difference between $9,000,000 and $100,000,000.

Mr. HATCH. I suppose the gentleman would not purposely misrepresent me. Did he understand me to say that this canal would cost $100,000,000?

Mr. MURPHY. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. HATCH. Did the gentleman understand me as saying that the Hennepin Canal would cost $100,000,000?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. HATCH. I did not say any such thing; but in my opinion it would lead to an expenditure of not only $100,000,000 but $500,000,000.

Mr. MURPHY. There it is again! The gentleman has got off on the same extravagant line of thought.

Mr. NEECE. I would like to ask——

Mr. MURPHY. I have not time to yield.

Mr. Speaker, I do know that while this canal, according to the report of the engineers, will cost about $9,000,000, it can be demonstrated, if I have an opportunity, that its construction will save to the producers of the West and the consumers of the East over $30,000,000 per annum. Furthermore, it will give to the Knights of Labor, whose interests we are all seeking to promote and harmonize, some bread and meat, in consideration of labor, for the poor and the needy. That is what it will do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 102, not voting 107; as follows:

So the rules were not suspended, and the resolution was not adopted, two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. MORRILL (who, if present, would vote "ay") with Mr. GROUT, (who would vote "no").

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. KELLEY, for the rest of the day.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. BINGHAM, for the rest of the day.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. ALLEN, for the rest of the day.

Mr. WARD with Mr. DAVENPORT, for the rest of the day.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. ATKINSON, for the rest of the day.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. BOYLE, on this vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded,

Mr. RANDALL moved that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 97.

So the House refused to adjourn.

CAMPBELL VS. WEAVER.

Mr. PAYNE, by unanimous consent, presented the views of the minority of the Committee on Elections in the case of Campbell against Weaver; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, May 4, 1886, after the hour for consideration of bills reported from committees, be fixed for the consideration of such bills as may be indicated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the bills reported by said committee, and that this order shall continue from day to day until the bills so indicated shall have been disposed of by the House; not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills or prior special orders or the order in favor of the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MORRISON. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. MORRISON and Mr. DIBBLE.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask by unanimous consent the second be considered as ordered.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, no; let us see how many we have.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 142, noes 44.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate; fifteen minutes in favor of the resolution and fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

The gentleman from South Carolina will be recognized to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Illinois, who demanded the second, the time in opposition to it.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will reserve the time in favor of the motion. I do not think there is any necessity for debate.

The SPEAKER. If no further time is to be taken up, the Chair will put the question to the House.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the proceedings of the House further than to say these gentlemen immediately and locally interested understand each other. [Laughter.] We know from the beginning all these bills for the construction of public buildings embraced in the order, already reported or not, are to be passed when this order is made. To make the order is to pass the bills, because it is an omnibus. The friends of the meritorious will then need the help of such as have no merit, and to get it must help in return. In that way good measures will be made to help the bad.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina what are the number of bills and the amount of money involved in them?

Mr. DIBBLE. The number of bills on the Calendar is thirty-seven, and the amount involved about $4,000,000. They include one-half Senate bills and one-half House bills.

Mr. OWEN. The average amount appropriated in the last seven or eight years has been nearly $7,000,000, and all we ask now is about $4,000,000. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield me the floor.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MORRISON. All he wants.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I think the House would do well to pause and consider the result of the adoption of this resolution. I know there is a general desire for the consideration of bills for public buildings at various places in the country, but I am also aware that the tendency to multiply them is increasing beyond the growth of any other expenditure, even that of the river and harbor bill itself.

I looked at the appropriation bill for 1878 to see the number provided for there and it was only nineteen. It continued to range about that point for quite a number of years until it received an impetus in the Forty-seventh Congress. Then there were a large number authorized to be constructed. In the Forty-eighth Congress there was a great struggle for the construction of public buildings. Seven or eight millions were authorized to be passed in addition to works then going on. Quite a number of statutes have passed in this House authorizing the construction of public buildings, and at one time the rage for these public building was so intense and reckless, I am informed, the Senate sent in one batch thirty-seven of them.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There were two for every State as regularly as they came up.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suppose they are hereafter to come in the same way. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, we have in addition to these a notice from the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that as the Calendar now stands we are to be invited to the consideration of $4,000,000 more of these buildings all around the country, and that many more will be on the Calendar by the time we shall reach the day fixed by this resolution. How many they can pass under this order, continuing as it does from day to day until they get tired or disgusted with the whole performance, no human being can tell. But I do know there has been a greater disposition to pass public building bills during this Congress than any I have ever known.

I do not see why the committee can not be content with the hour fixed by the rules for this purpose. Experience up to this time has disclosed the fact that we are able under the new rules to pass a great many bills of this character; and it does seem to me as if we were going to strike down all restraints, to throw open the door and pass building after building, involving expenditure after expenditure out of the Federal Treasury, without any discretion whatever. Where is it to end? If this had been a proposition to limit the number of bills to a reasonable sum, if we had any specific number upon which we are called to pass, it would be better; but we are to vote blindly on thirty now on the Calendar and all the balance that can be placed there from now until this resolution takes effect, never stopping until the whole subject has been exhausted or the Treasury has been exhausted.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy to rush forward and do this thing. The House has the power to throw open the door and let all of these bills go through; but there was a time in this House, through Congress after Congress, when a proposition of this kind could not be passed.

In the Forty-fourth Congress——

Mr. DIBBLE. Will you permit a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. DIBBLE. I want to know if that was before the Macon bill was passed. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I expected just that appeal. Is that a reasonable answer to the question, whether or not we shall go forward and pass bills erecting building after building; to lay aside important business and work day after day until we shall have given everybody, not only at Macon but everywhere else, all they want?

Mr. DIBBLE. It is to be presumed that the places are at least as meritorious as Macon.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah! I am glad that my friend got all this in. I hope he is content, but I wish to say that the Macon building was never passed in this manner. There never was a House—even the last House of Representatives did not pursue any such order as this in connection with this business. It is furnishing a facility beyond anything in the past for getting such bills through. The Macon building took its chances as all buildings have done heretofore; and if the gentleman from South Carolina shall bring any inconsistency to my door, and if he shall prove that while appealing to others to do right I have not been willing to do so myself, I ask if the gentleman is satisfied that that answers the public demand and the public interests? If he thinks it will, he will find when this great array of public buildings shall have been brought forward for expenditure from the public Treasury there will be others away from here who will not readily accept his conclusions.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would like to ask another question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly, all you want; but I only ask, when you come to refer to this question and take your own time, that you will tell this House whether a proposition to invite gentlemen to march forward to the Federal Treasury has ever been supported by any Congress heretofore? Now, ask anything you want.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would like to ask whether the gentleman voted for a proposition as broad as this in the last Congress?

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Did not the gentleman from Georgia sustain just such a proposition?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Did he not vote for just such a resolution in the Forty-eighth Congress?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Did he raise his voice and vote against it or protest against it as loudly as he does now?

Mr. BLOUNT. There was no such proposition pending. They asked a day for the consideration of their bills, and that was the most they asked.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Was that resolution not just as broad and sweeping as this?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And let me remind the gentleman from Georgia, too, that even that order was broken down and could not be enforced, although it was not as radical by one-fourth as this is.

Mr. BLOUNT. It never was, and the proposition was different. You do not ask here for a day. You ask that all the legislation for this great country for every department of the Government shall be suspended and that you shall be allowed to go on and continue from day to day voting for every public building that anybody wants.

This House is too intelligent for my inconsistency, if there be inconsistency, to help these gentlemen forward with this scheme. I have regretted that it was necessary for me to say anything. I have not obstructed the wishes of gentlemen. There has been great liberality displayed in this regard. But when I heard this proposition, and when I remembered the declarations made by my party in favor of public economy, and when I remembered its antecedents, I was not willing to keep silent and perhaps to bring mockery on the professions we have made. The Democratic party has never obtained popular favor on any other idea so much as it has done from its regard for economy in public expenditures. That idea may be laughed at here, and oftentimes by some gentlemen it has been made a term of reproach. But it is not so when they go forth through the land bidding the people to approve of this or that action of their party. All of these gentlemen, however much they may have ridiculed economy in expenditures here, have gone to every hustings and proclaimed they were par excellence the guardians of the Treasury.

I have no objection to a reasonable consideration of these bills. I have no objection to the passing of the usual number, or if need be even of more than that. But I beg to say that at this time the force in the Treasury Department necessary to do the work is entirely inadequate. Even now if you get your plans, and commence the construction of the buildings you have on hand, you can make no progress, vote as many bills through as you please, until you have increased immensely the number of employés in the Architect's Office.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? This resolution is not confined to one day, to one week, or even to this session, but its operation may run to the 4th of next March.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly it may.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There is no limit to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DIBBLE. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] labors under a misapprehension as to the facts in relation to the order made in the last Congress. To save time I will read from the RECORD instead of sending it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That Wednesday, April 9, 1884, be set apart for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Senate bills upon the Speaker's table relating to the erection of public buildings as the committee shall designate, and that this special order continue from day to day until all such bills on the House Calendar and the Speaker's table shall have been considered and acted upon by the House, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills and special orders heretofore made."

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman turn to the ay-and-no vote on that proposition?

Mr. DIBBLE. I find the question was taken by yeas and nays, and by some accident, I suppose, the name of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is recorded in the affirmative. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will my friend from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman has quoted this as a precedent, and relies on it as an argument that this resolution of similar character should go through.

Mr. DIBBLE. Not at all; the gentleman misapprehends me.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask him as a member of that Congress if it is not a fact that they attempted to enforce that resolution and were engaged for two days in enforcing it, and then it broke down of its own rottenness when only three bills had been reported from the Committee of the Whole and none had passed the House?

Mr. WHEELER. If that is the case it can not do much harm now.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope it can not. But now is the time to prevent its harm by defeating its adoption.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee. The House did take up the consideration of those bills and a small minority, just enough to call the yeas and nays in the House, filibustered on the passage of those bills, and after they had tired the House for two days the special order was abandoned.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will not the same thing occur again?

Mr. DIBBLE. No, sir. I give the House credit for better intelligence. After the lessons of the last days of the last Congress I believe this House will never consent that its business of this nature should not be considered in a business-like way. In the closing hours of the session, when every one is rushing to the floor, bill after bill for public buildings is passed without deliberation whether the case has been investigated or not. In the interest of public business being deliberately done I ask whether it is not better to devote two or three days—and I assure the House according to my estimate it will not consume more than two or three days at the furthest—whether it is not better to take up these propositions one by one and let them be thoroughly understood before being acted upon.

Is the House afraid of itself? Is the gentleman from Georgia afraid the House will run away with the Treasury on its back? Why, sir, look at the record of the last Congress. I have it here; every bill that was passed; every increase of limit that was made. We have reported four millions here for the consideration of this House. In the last Congress over six and a half millions—nearly seven millions—were passed in a manner entirely indefensible. Of that legislation $3,235,000 passed in appropriation bills, one of those appropriation bills passing without being read in the House, at the very close of the session.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMES. I understand the gentleman to make a comparison between the appropriations for public buildings in the last Congress and in this. Do I understand that these bills contain all the recommendations to be made by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at this session?

Mr. DIBBLE. Not at all, sir. I will speak of that point in a few moments. Bills that were separately recommended by the committee and passed amounted to $3,652,000,000. That made $6,900,000, nearly. That was the work of the last Congress. Numbers of meritorious bills that should have passed that Congress were obstructed by the small filibustering minority to which I have alluded; and while, in answer to the question directed to me by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES], I do not mean to say that this is all the legislation of this kind recommended or to be recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at the present session, I do say that whatever legislation that committee present they will endeavor to put before the House so that it may know what it is doing and may act deliberately.

Past Congresses have been in the habit of inaugurating new public buildings to the extent of between seven and eight millions per Congress. It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the first session of a Congress is the only time when these measures can be discussed and considered with deliberation. When the second session comes it lasts only three months, and the appropriation bills, if properly treated, occupy nearly the entire time. This House will always be informed by the present Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds as to what amount it has appropriated for these purposes. We will endeavor to keep the House informed upon that point at all times. We desire now to present this measure and let the House act. We realize that we are the servants of the House, bound to present our business for its consideration in a business-like way. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this resolution. I think it well enough to appropriate money for the construction of these proposed new buildings. They are needed, I presume; the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would not recommend them if they were not. Moreover, this kind of legislation will have a tendency to shut out legislation of a very much worse character. The Committee on Ways and Means is proposing a certain measure here, and I am in favor of occupying as much time as possible with other measures to the exclusion of that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is that your object in favoring the passage of this resolution?

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, we have a spectacle here which the country should witness. Only a few moments ago we voted upon a resolution reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs fixing a time for the consideration of a bill which looks to the construction of a navy. That resolution was defeated. The bill which it was designed to bring before the House for action has the cordial and earnest support of the Secretary of the Navy. He has recommended the building of war ships. But the resolution was voted down. On the other side of the Atlantic such a vote would be construed as a vote of want of confidence in the Secretary of the Navy.

We do not get the ships. But when we are called upon to vote for a resolution fixing a day for the consideration of public-building bills, we carry it by 140 against 24, thus voting confidence in ourselves, although we may not have so much confidence in the branch of the Government at the other end of the Avenue. [Laughter.]

The situation is somewhat suggestive. On the question of constructing public buildings we seem to be substantially undivided, while upon the question of constructing a navy there appears to be much diversity of opinion. I am glad to believe that a majority of the votes cast in favor of taking up the naval bill comes from my Republican associates.

Mr. HEWITT. Has the gentleman made the count?

Mr. BAYNE. I have not time to be interrupted. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another suggestion which applies to many of my friends on this side of the Chamber and to some on the other side. In the last Congress we passed a large subsidy ostensibly for the merchant marine. Not one dollar if it had been expended would have been likely to have been put into a plank in a ship; but now when we have an opportunity to vote authority and money for the construction of ships which the Government would own, when we have a chance to make an appropriation, every dollar of which would go into the construction of ships, we fail to do so.

For myself, I am in favor of the construction of ships which the Government will own; I am in favor of voting money for the building of a navy. We have a defenseless coast; we have a number of defenseless cities along that coast which are at the mercy of every third-rate nation in the world; yet we refuse to promote a measure to put our Navy in a condition to defend our coast; we refuse to trust a Democratic Secretary of the Navy (in whom, I confess, I have confidence), to make preparations to defend our cities, although, as I have said, we have heretofore voted a large amount of money which would have gone into the pockets of a wealthy syndicate under the guise of promoting the merchant marine.

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has three minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, so far as the pending resolution and the one adopted in the last Congress are concerned, I have made an examination of them, and I do not think they are identical. The resolution adopted in the last Congress provided, as I understand, for the consideration of bills upon the House Calendar and upon the Speaker's table, and that is what we all understood we were voting on.

We were informed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at that time of the number of bills they proposed to pass. They had made a calculation which they showed in debate, and the debate disclosed that, so far as the opinion of the committee was concerned, the appropriations they contemplated did not exceed the appropriations of the preceding Congress.

But, sir, suppose the resolutions were identical. Is the situation of to-day identical with that in the last Congress? At the time the House passed the resolution referred to, four months had elapsed, and not a public-building bill had been considered; it had been impossible to obtain the consideration of such bills. Such was the announcement of the chairman of the committee at that time, and the matter is within the knowledge of the House. So that the only method left for securing the consideration of those bills was to adopt such a resolution. What is the case in this House? The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has already had several hours and will have more. The favorable disposition of the House has been shown by demanding very little time for debate. Yet with all the facilities the committee has for passing these bills—facilities equal to those of most of the committees of the House—we are invited to repeat the resolution adopted in the last House, and give this additional facility of going on from day to day, and passing not only bills now on the Calendar and Speaker's table but all that may go there thereafter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, whether my position on this question is consistent or not it does not affect the merits of this question. Whatever the fact may be as to my consistency, the question will come back whether this is a reasonable thing to do, whether it is not extravagant, whether it will not be so regarded by the country; and it should be remembered that this House may have to meet extravagance not only from this quarter but from other quarters in respect to other items.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate in opposition to the motion has now expired.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there no more time for debate against the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has just consumed the last three minutes.

Mr. NEECE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 68, noes 96.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] is entitled to three minutes.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I have only this to say, that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds may be depended on to keep in due observance all the precedents of the previous Congress and to endeavor not to exceed them, and they will be willing to inform the House as to the amount authorized to be expended at any time.

Mr. EDEN. Last Saturday we could hardly keep the House within the limits of the order.

Mr. DIBBLE. On Saturday last we passed bills to the amount of less than $100,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which has been read.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 52 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 77, not voting 104; as follows:

So the rules were not suspended and the resolution was not adopted (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof).

During the roll-call,

Mr. RANDALL moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. WILKINS objected.

Mr. FELTON. I ask leave to vote. I was in the Hall when my name was called, but did not hear it.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. LOWRY with Mr. STEELE, on this vote.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. WAITE, for the rest of the day.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

LAKE SUPERIOR AND PUGET SOUND RAILROAD.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am directed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Perhaps if I am permitted to make an explanation it will save the necessity of reading the bill.

Mr. HEWITT. The bill ought to be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only wanted, if possible, to avoid the detention of the House by the reading of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT. I insist upon the reading of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw the request.

The bill was read, as follows:

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, reported the following bill as a substitute for H. R. 3752:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget's Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," requiring said Northern Pacific Railroad Company to pay the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying the lands granted to said railroad.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget's Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: After the twentieth section of said act add the following:

"That before any land granted by the United States to said Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall be conveyed to any company or party entitled thereto, there shall first be paid into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same by the said company or party in interest, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account, to be used by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of said road, and so from year to year until the whole shall be completed as provided by law; that the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, shall, within ninety days from the passage of this act, or within sixty days from the date of the receipt at the respective district land offices of the approved plat or plats of townships embracing lands within the established limits of the grant or grants, make and file in the said district land office, under existing regulations, their lists of selections of the land claimed by them under their respective grants, and to deposit therewith in such district land office, or the Treasury of the United States, as the Secretary of the Interior may designate, the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same; that in the event of the failure of said company to pay the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying such land within the time prescribed by this act, then the Secretary of the Interior shall immediately notify the president or treasurer of said company of the amount of land which it is entitled to patent, and the amount of the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, and that he is ready to deliver to the company, or its successors or assigns, patents for all said tracts or parcels of land then surveyed and platted upon the payment of such costs; and if such company shall not, within sixty days after the receipt of said notice, pay such costs, then and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall notify the Attorney-General of the United States of such failure or default, and of the amount of such costs, as nearely as may be; whereupon said Attorney-General is authorized and directed to institute forthwith, in the name of the United States of America, in a circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of suits against the company so in default, any and all legal proceedings against said company necessary and proper to secure the payment of all said costs, and of the further costs of all such legal proceedings; and upon the voluntary payment or collection of said costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying, the Secretary of the Interior shall issue patents conveying to said company, or its successors or assigns, title to the lands to which it or they may be entitled, and shall place said patents upon record in his Department, and shall notify the president of such company that said patents have been so issued and recorded, and are ready for delivery to said company."

SEC. 2. That all the lands granted by the act of July 2, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget's Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," and any act amendatory thereof, which have been surveyed, and to which said company has become entitled to receive patents upon payment of the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, notwithstanding such company has not made such payment, shall be subject to all legal taxes imposed under authority of any State or Territory in which such lands are located to the same extent as they would have been had such costs been paid and the lands conveyed to said railroad company: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as applying to lands already forfeited by said railroad company, nor shall it operate to relieve the company from any forfeiture heretofore incurred: And provided further, That prior to the payment of such costs of surveying by said railroad company no taxes shall be imposed except in organized counties.

SEC. 3. That in any sale of such lands for taxes the moneys due or to become due the United States under said acts for such costs, fees, &c., shall be and remain a first lien on such lands, and shall be paid by the purchaser at such tax-sale to the receiver of public moneys in the land district wherein such lands are situate; whereupon, his title under the tax-sale being complete, such purchaser shall receive a patent for the land so purchased by him, and which patent shall operate only as an evidenee of the tax-title, which title shall be subject and subordinate to all the rights of the United States in respect of such lands growing out of the lien and security on such lands created in respect of the subsidy bonds issued by the United States in aid of the construction of said railroad, which facts and reservations shall be stated in such patents.

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall be construed or taken in any wise to affect or impair the right of Congress, at any time hereafter further to alter, amend, or repeal the said acts hereinbefore mentioned, as in the opinion of Congress justice or the public welfare may require, or to impair or waive any right or remedy in the premises now existing in favor of the United States. This act shall be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal.

The SPEAKER. Is a second of the motion demanded?

Mr. HEWITT. I demand it.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 36.

CAMPBELL AGAINST WEAVER.

Mr. HALL. Before the vote is announced I wish to give notice that Wednesday next, after the morning hour, the Committee on Elections will call up the contested-election case from the State of Iowa of Campbell vs. Weaver.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.
